There is also manifested a spirit of persons setting themselvs up as perfect, or nearest so of any others in existence; criticising in an uncalled-for manner all who do not agree with them in their particular gait that they ride their hobby. They do not seem to realize that difference of opinion arises from one's knowing more or not as much as another, which in either case needs only an explanation, and not expression that appeals only to the propensities.

The National Liberal League.

Since the foundation of our republic, Christianity has held supreme dominion in the United States, and boasts to-day of having placed the Bible in every house, established Sunday-schools in every neighborhood, and churches everywhere. What is the result? The religious press, priests, and parsons, all acknowledge the demoralization of our public men, who trained in Sunday-schools; and to-day professed Christians are yet reeking with corruption. Public honor and integrity are openly derided as old fogyism, only cultivated by a few cranks and Infidels.

This is pre-eminently the age of unlimited Christian influence, bank defalcations, thieving presidents, and absconding cashiers and confidential clerks, nearly every one of whom are pillars of the church, bright and shining lights of the Young Men's Christian Association, and superintendents or teachers of the Sabbath-school.

Among all the vast number of villians, robbers, and skulking or fleeing convicts, we do not find a single Infidel of note, or hear of one that has betrayed a public trust, or even been accessory to crime, or a sharer of the spoils. Yet priests and parsons declare that all of goodness, virtue, and truth is the outcome of Christianity; and that all that is vile, base, degrading, infamous, and criminal is of Liberalism and Infidelity.

While professing to teach love, peace, and good will, they incite to envy, bitterness, dissension, and hate (even among themselvs), and try to poison the minds of our children against us, and the noble and pure principles of Liberalism. "Do justice, love mercy, and endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy"—principles they declare subversiv of and in direct opposition to Christianity. In the place of science and truth, they fill the minds of our children with obsolete ideas and false theories, teaching that to be washed in blood is the one, only, sure method to attain purity, gentleness, and love; that to lay the consequences of all mean, cruel, or criminal acts on an innocent victim, is the most sublime justice; that to anathematize, torture, and burn all who differ with them on these points, is the most godlike magnanimity—the most exhalted Christianity; that a life of benevolence, virtue, and heroic self-sacrifice for the good of others, is to be looked upon with abhorrence—regarded as filthy rags; that to believe right—not living right—causes angels of heaven to rejoice, and is the one only sure passport to eternal glory.

Too long hav Liberals permitted this to continue without one earnest, united, practical effort to stop or overthrow it. Too long hav they allowed themselvs to be misrepresented, maligned, and ostracized. The hour has come to awake from this apathy and indifference, and let our friends and neighbors know the facts. Having received the light, it is our bounden duty to let it shine upon the world.

We claim to be earnestly desirous of emancipation from the dominion of priestcraft, and the usurpations and tyrannical exactions and dictation of the church. To attain it we must cease imitating these Christians, fighting each other about metaphysical questions, and organize for effectiv, agressiv, persistent action.

The officers of the National Liberal League earnestly solicit the help and co-operation of every true Liberal, that the League may fulfil its mission and become a mighty power in securing equal rights and liberty for all, regardless of religious faith or the lack of it. United efforts must be made to reach the people by the same agencies so effectivly used by the Christians.

Thorough and efficient organization is an imperativ necessity. In every place where there are even a few genuin Liberals, a live local League should at once be organized. The women and children must be enlisted; every member be instructed in the best, most judicious, and effectiv method of distributing Liberal literature and obtaining subscribers for our best Liberal papers; and each local League made in every respect, both social and educational, superior to the church and Sunday-school.

The officers of the National Liberal League are eager, ready, willing, waiting, to do this very work. Nothing hinders but lack of funds. Dear reader, how much hav you given? The organization of local Leagues will help the weakly ones to stem the current of popular prejudice, Christian ostracism, and priestly denunciation. The lonely ones will soon cease to stand alone, for, under the judicious labors of the National Liberal League, those convinced of the truth will be induced to come to the front and unite, thus forming a nucleus around which honest hearts can rally, until the little few shall become the powerful many, and instead of misrepresentation and ostracism, Liberals shall be respected and beloved.

It is alike to the interest, as well as the duty, of all to do what they can to sustain the League. If all do this, ample funds will be provided. In union is strength. Let each and all honest hearts unite in one earnest, self-sacrificing effort, and success beyond our fondest anticipations will result. Send at once; send by draft, express, or post-office order payable to S. P. Putnam, Secretary National Liberal League, 55 East 9th street, New York.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS,
Chairman Ex. Com. National Liberal League.

The Hill Difficulty,

Or the difficulty with Mr. Hill, is that, like most other Prohibitionists, he refuses to notice the facts and arguments of his opponents; refuses to be impartial and consistent in his search after the causes of crime and the remedies therefor.

"Narrow-mindedness" is rich, coming from a Prohibitionist, but how the charge against me can be made to "consist" with, "Freethought consists not in all acting alike, but in universal mental liberty concerning rum, religion, or anything else," it remains to be seen. That would be my definition of Freethought, and it is utterly incompatible with Prohibition. Most assuredly, Freethought does not consist "in all acting alike," but prohibition does consist in all acting alike, or rather in trying to make all act alike; and from Mr. Hill's own argument the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will perceive how irreconcilable Freethought and prohibition are, and that in the first two paragraphs of the article in which he started out to prove my "narrow-mindedness," in asserting that "no man who accepts the fundamental principles of Freethought, knowing what it is that he accepts, can be a Prohibitionist," he demonstrates the absolute correctness of my proposition.

Mr. Hill makes no point whatever in his talk about "barn burning," etc. It is a question of private welfare, not of "public welfare." If a man having a building next his (Mr. Hill's), set it on fire, he puts Mr. Hill's property in danger, and that gentleman has a claim against him, but he has no right to prevent him building there for fear that he may sometime set his building on fire and thus endanger his property. If all men who build barns set them on fire, the argument would assume another aspect. If all men who drink committed crimes, that would put prohibition upon a solid basis in justice. But they may commit crimes, you say? So every man may set his barn on fire, especially if it is insured. To lesson the risk to your property from your neighbor's incendiarism, you had better stir around and get a law passed forbidding insurance on barns. See?

"And if one thing deemed to be against the public welfare can be rightfully prohibited, it follows that all things so deemed can be treated likewise," solemnly asseverates Mr. Hill. Exactly, but who is going to do all this "deeming?" Is there to be no limit to the public control of the individual? Is there to be no rule of right which shall determin how far the majority is to go in the "deeming" business? Or is this God of Mr. Hill's omnipotent?

Mr. Hill, in common with the rest of the sumptuarists, claims to be in pursuit of the causes of crime, and having found them, he wants to remove them at once. But is he in earnest in that search? Does he mean what he says? If he does, why does he so persistently ignore facts? There are innumerable causes of crime, chief among which are bad heredity, avarice, perversions of the love faculty, and alcoholic intemperance. I hav repeatedly called the attention of prohibitionists to these various causes of crime. many times in these columns, and asked them to apply their logic impartially to all, just as I now ask Mr. Hill to do. But they remain as silent as the grave. They know better than to grapple with the question seriously.

Take avarice, for instance. Leaving out of account for the present the enormous robberies by government and government officials, see the immense multitude of crimes, murders, robberies, cases of arson, embezzlement, etc., to which it incites. "Three innocent people" stabbed "in the public street," says Mr. Hill, therefore suppress the sale of intoxicants. Well, here is a bank failure produced by the embezzlement of large sums by its officers. Hundreds of poor people lose all the savings of years. Some of them commit suicide. All are on the verge of destitution. Three men in whom avarice dominates all else enter a house at night and mangle, and finally murder, two old ladies for a few dollars, which they had. To apply your own question, Mr. Hill, Do not these crimes "giv a just claim for protection against the property nuisance?" For what is avarice? The desire for private gain, private property. Then the institution of private property is the cause of these awful crimes, is it not? Why, then, as you are hunting for causes of crimes, don't you institute a crusade against private property? Strike at the root of the evil, my boy. Your fellow-prohibitionist, Mr. Alcand r Longley, of the Communist, is the only one of you all whom I hav found logical, frank, and courageous enough to demand this. He says that private property is the root and cause of most crimes, and must be prohibited. Why, your prohibition is a little, sickly, puny, woe-begone-looking angel when you stand it in the light beside Mr. Longley's lusty, vigorous imp of tyranny. And he says more than this. He says that liquor-selling and intemperance are only secondary, that the desire for gain is the cause of man engaging in that nefarious business of salooning, and that intemperance can be destroyed only by the abolition of private ownership, thus taking away the desire for gain. What do you think of that? Dare you thus follow your principles to their logical outcome? Here, indeed, is where your "deeming" ends, in so far as property is concerned. And the perversion of the love faculty, and heredity weaknesses, must be dealt with in a similar radical manner, if law and suppression are the means through which humanity is to be disenthralled, purified, and perfected. But they are not the means. Only through greater liberty, not less, will the condition of our race be bettered.

Communists of the Longley school are the only consistent Prohibitionists in the land, and the day is swiftly approaching when men of Mr. Hill's half-way ideas and methods will hav to choose between us who stand for the complete liberty of the individual, and Longley & Co., who stand for none at all.

E. C. WALKER.

J. L. Andrew.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I should hav sent you brief accounts of my work long before this, but the limited spare time at my disposal has prevented me. Since I last wrote I hav delivered a few lectures in Illinois and Kentucky. For the last month I hav been in Texas, and hav given up to this date thirteen lectures. At Norse, I delivered two; at Heidenheimer, five; at Salado, five; and at Fort Worth, one. at the Opera House, on Sunday night. Although Fort Worth has a population of upward of twenty thousand, with the exception of one or two lectures delivered by Mr. Shaw, of Waco, the lecture I gave was the first Liberal address ever delivered in the city. An audience numbering nearly two hundred assembled to hear the lecture. From what I hav been reliably informed, that would be a fair audience if equally divided among three or four churches. There had been a heavy rain the day before, rendering the streets very muddy; otherwise there would probably hav been not less than five hundred persons present. The notice in the next morning's issue of the Daily Gazette (a copy of which I forward you) is one of the most complimentary ever given to any Liberal lecturer. As that paper is proverbially conservativ, and leans strongly to the church, its eulogy is the more reliable. Besides, like all other notices of the press in relation to my lectures, it was unsolicited.

The great commercial drawback in Texas this year is the deficient cotton crop, caused by long drouth. But the people are as industrious—although in rural districts very ignorant—as are the citizens of any other state. Enterprise—the unswerving determination to push business—is truly characteristic of every town I hav visited.

I hav made the acquaintance of Dr. L. J. Russell, of Heidenheimer, who was severely whipped, and narrowly escaped with his life, a few years ago by ignorant Christian bigots. The reason for their selecting Dr. Russell for a victim was because he was the most intelligent and most influential Freethinker in that county, and because he defended the Liberals and their cause against the slanderous report of Christian piety. Several debates had previously been held by the doctor and some Christian ministers, and the assurance that their cause was rendered weak by open controversy excited their most malicious feelings.

A fair sample of ministerial intelligence and manhood happened at the close of the last lecture that I delivered at Salado. A Christian (Campbellite) minister was in attendance, and as soon as the lecture was over, he rose very solemnly and said: "I wish to make a few remarks." I then took my seat and patiently listened to what he would say. "It is generally admitted," he said, "that Solomon was one of the wisest of men." He then paused for a moment as if he expected me to assent to what he said. Of course I did nothing of the kind. He again proceeded, "Solomon said, 'Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit! There is more hope of a fool than of him! Thou art the man!'" with a long, arrogant bow. I was rather surprised at the brevity and curtness of his reply, and gave the following response: "I thank you for the extreme gentlemanliness and courtesy of your remarks. I am fully persuaded that you are a Christian, for such language as you hav just uttered is never used by any Freethinker, and we all treat it with the contempt it deserves. But when you claim that Solomon was a wise man, I am compelled to disagree with you." "Well, what is wisdom?" he asked. "The application of knowledge to the general affairs of life," I replied. "And if you think that a man with a thousand wives is wise, if you think that a man whose conduct throughout his life compelled him to say at its close, 'All is vanity and vexation of spirit,' is wise, I think otherwise." "He may not hav been wise according to your idea of wisdom, but he was a wise man." With that he took his hat, and when he reached the door of the hall, he turned toward the rostrum and said, "I could reply to all you hav said if I had time." Of course he had no time.

There is a marked difference between the average intellectual condition of the farmers and the tradesmen of Texas. Homes by the hundred are without books or papers of any kind. The Baptist and Methodist churches—the strongest in the state—are fortified numerically by this class. The ignorance and the piety of these people render their condition deplorable. When crops are threatened with a drouth (as has been the case this year), they assemble together and call upon the Lord to giv them rain. No more certain proof of intellectual mediocrity can be adduced than that. The state being Democratic, the principal excitement caused by the coming election is concerning local politics. They are sure that Texas is a unit for Cleveland.

As in other states and countries, the power and bulk of Liberalism in Texas are in the cities. The facilities for mental and social improvement are far greater than in the agricultural districts, and there is a corresponding higher ambition among the rising generation of the towns. My facilities for knowing the truth may hav been very imperfect, but it is a rarity to find young men with even a smattering of useful scientific knowledge. This may seem strange, when Texas is renowned for a remarkably good school system and an almost exhaustless school fund. But the great defect is in the proper application of what resources are supplied by state power. I will relate a circumstance that occurred not long ago, when a teacher was examined to test his ability to teach. "Do you teach that the earth is round or flat?" "That depends on whether it is required to hav it taught to your children. If you wish to hav it flat, I will teach them so; and if you wish it round, I will teach them that is round. But my opinion is that it is flat."

Another circumstance recently occurred which illustrates the present cause of the inefficieny of the school system. A Freethinker was engaged to teach a certain school in the northern part of the state, and before the term commenced he was asked whether or not he believed in hell. He said he did not, and that becoming noised abroad, the directors of the school officially informed him that he was not wanted. When asked for the reason, they replied that no man could teach their children who did not believe in future punishment.

But Liberalism will save Texas. And from the unpolished masses of this and other states will rise a nation worthy of the cause of freedom.

Fort Scott, Kan. J. L. ANDREW.

Do We Admit It?

When I write a note, or a letter, or other article, or communication, dated, for instance, Oct. 28, 1884, it is claimed by my opponent that I admit that Jesus Christ was born 1884 years ago, and that I also admit that the world commenced to liv in its true sense at the time that Jesus was sent into the world. Which I deny. While I admit that in all such matter it is necessary to conform to the usages and customs of a long accepted idea in order to be understood, I claim that, in consequence of the tyrannical rule of the Catholic church for so many hundreds of years, and the birth of Jesus having been taught for as many years as the greatest event of the world's existence, and never having been publicly denied, we, without an admission or denial, simply accept it as we accept the starting-point of any other calculation. We accept the idea that 24 hours make 1 day, or 16 ounces make 1 pound, from the same reason that the long established custom makes it so. The historian necessarily is obliged to hav a starting-point, and the alleged data of the birth of Jesus, according to the only existing book for hundreds of years prior to civilization, furnishes him late from which to make himself understood. We would get just as much time to liv if 60 hours made 1 day, or just as much butter for 25 cents, if 100 ounces made 1 pound.

W. H. PENFIELD.

The Ninety and Nine.

There are ninety and nine that liv and die
In want and hunger and cold,
That one may revel in luxury
And be lapped in its silken fold;
The ninety and nine in their hovels bare,
The one in a palace, with riches rare.

They toil in the fields, the ninety and nine,
For the fruits of our mother earth;
They dig and delve in the dusky mine,
And bring its treasures forth;
And the wealth released by their sturdy blows
To the hands of the one forever flows.

From the sweat of their brows the desert blooms,
And the forest before them falls;
Their labor has builded humble homes,
And cities with lofty halls;
And the one owns city, homes, and lands,
And the ninety and nine hav empty hands.

Frederic Harrison's Paper.

We do not remember ever having seen a more eloquent defense of a clearer general statement of what Positivism is than that we print this week from the Nineteenth Century from the pen of Frederic Harrison, the Newton Hall lecturer, in his reply to Mr. Herbert Spencer. His paper will be followed next week by one from one of his co-workers, Courtlandt Palmer, on the "Supreme Being."

Between the Positiv philosophy, as explained by Mr. Harrison, and the Secular philosophy, as elaborated by the English Freethinkers, there is no appreciable difference, except that Positivism furnishes a sentimental as well as utilitarian incentiv to right living and benevolent action. The object of philosophy, says Comte, is to present a systematic view of human life as a basis for modifying its imperfections. The theological system having utterly failed in its mission of redemption, because founded upon false premises, it was Comte's notion that a philosophy which should include all the practical ideas of life, leaving the unknowable to take care of itself, would prove a boon of incalculable worth to humanity. He saw that the old principles on which society has been governed must finally become powerless, and it was his aim to construct a synthesis that could embrace the entire range of thought, and also regulate practical life. This synthesis he called Positiv, meaning, reality and usefulness. In his elaboration of this scheme into a "theology," he cumbered it with many things "tentativ and utopian," practically useless, and religiously foolish. Taking Comte's main idea of the worth of humanity for all man's reverence, it has been the labor of the last few years of Mr. Harrison's life to make the public acquainted with a new synthetic philosophy which may—without idolatry and superstition, and with no recourse to chimeras—satisfy rational people, stimulate them to action, and encourage all except manifestly useless efforts.

If Positivism seems to hav a cold hand, it must be acknowledged that it has a warm heart to find its spring of conduct solely in affection and reverence for the human race, so many of whom hav proved totally unworthy of both. If Mr. Harrison's defense and plea shall arouse any to a deeper sense of the obligations they owe their fellow-men, if it shall kindle in only one heart a firmer determination to work for others as well as for self, the space it occupies will hav been well used.

The League Campaign.

Now that the national campaign is over, the people hav time to pay attention to other matters than the presidential canvass. The League officers hav taken the field, with the intention of remaining steadily at work till the hot months of next summer. They wish to visit as many places as possible, holding a meeting every night, and two on Sunday when practicable. Messrs. Watts and Putnam will travel together, forming Leagues and teaching Freethought, and Mr. C. B. Reynolds, the energetic chairman of the Executiv Committee, will go wherever his services are required either for lecturing or organization.

During November Messrs. Watts and Putnam are engaged at Newark, Stamford, Albany, and Philadelphia. They would like to obtain encouragement to visit smaller places and speak week-day evenings. In December they are engaged to attend the Salamanca and the Toronto conventions, after which they will go west to Rochester, Pittsburgh, Altoona, Alliance, Salem, Grand Rapids, Detroit, Chicago, Kansas City, St. Louis, etc. They desire us to ask all the Liberal friends who can arrange for lectures in their respectiv towns to communicate at once with Mr. Putnam, that the long route may be economically laid out as to time and traveling expenses.

Although the campaign upon which our League officers are now entering will not convulse the country as the political canvass just closed, yet the principles they set out to uphold are more important than any advanced by either the Democratic or Republican standard bearers. They affect the very foundations of our republic; upon our officers' and their successors's success depend the permanence and purity of our free institutions. It is, we hold, the bounden duty of every Freethinker and of every patriot to extend to them all the aid and encouragement in his power.

Kissing the Rod.

The clergymen of this state, in the campaign just closed, covered themselvs with glory, but succeeded in defeating the grand old party, to which, because it had been victorious hitherto, they acknowledged their allegiance. These clerical gentlemen flooded the country with obscene literature, slandered candidates without stint, and while ostensibly working for morality, did more to corrupt the public mind than all the literature that Comstock has been able to suppress. The New York World puts it felicitously thus: Slander was backed by sanctity; defamation and regeneration walked hand in hand; lying and praying mingled. The "family purity" dodge was practiced by those [the clergy] who hav, unfortunately, contributed their full share to family impurity.

It is probable now that Mr. Cleveland will be our next president. He, like Mr. Blaine, kneels to the church, that thrift may follow fawning. Yet, except to Mr. H. W. Beecher, he owes nothing to the titled cloth of either great sect. It was a Presbyterian who dug up the scandal about his early life; it was an association of Protestant clergymen that flooded the country with scurrilous circulars defaming him; it was six hundred Protestant clergymen who, by calling in a body on his opponent, endeavored to get the church vote solid against him. The only prominent orthodox Protestant who helped him was a man who thought to do him the greatest injury. The "rum, Romanism, and rebellion" of the intemperate Mr. Burchard really helped instead of hurting him. The Catholic denomination also carried its spite for his veto of the Catholic Protectory appropriation to the ballot box. With but few exceptions the Catholic press deprecated his candidacy and exhorted against his election. Really, Mr. Cleveland owes the Christian church naught but a big grudge. Only the heretical Beecher, the Infidel pastor of Plymouth, labored to make his calling and election sure. Yet we dare be sworn our next president will truckle to the church as though to it he was deeply indebted. Such is the deep hold superstition has on men, and votes on politicians. A piece of news sent over the wires last Sunday was that Gov. Cleveland attended the Presbyterian church. Considering that the Rev. Mr. Ball and the Rev. Mr. Burchard are Presbyterian ministers, we think this is kissing the rod with more than sufficient humility.

Unwarrantable Condemnation!

We were grieved last week by receiving the following letter from an old and respected friend:

"COLETA, ILL., Oct. 28, 1884.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If an ancient people worshiped the male sexual organ, symbolized now by the cross, as the source of life, what was the harm? Why say, as is said in the issue of Oct. 25th, it was 'barbaric worship,' and that it was 'disgusting?' In commenting on Beecher's statement, could it not hav been cleanly and clearly stated what was the origin of the cross without unwarrantably condemning that origin as bad, as obscene?

"Clearly THE TRUTH SEEKER is such only in name; it is not a wise teacher, and as far as it is now edited, people will ever miss the light and truth they stand in need of. Please discontinue the copy to me at the close of the present year.

"JOSEPH ANTHONY."

What was the harm of worshiping the phallus? The answer must depend upon the definition of harm. If it is not harmful to indulge in obscene and beastly orgies in the name of religion, then there was no more harm in the phallic worship than in any other superstition. But we regard all superstitions as harmful—the phallic as well as the Christian, Mohammedan, and Mormon. We said that phallicism was barbaric and disgusting because we chose to tell rather than conceal the truth. It is supposed that Freethinkers know the origin of the cross (certainly Mr. Anthony does), and, also, that they know the manner in which its worship was conducted. But from his letter one would think that Mr. Anthony sees nothing harmful in the expression of this particular form of religious fanaticism, which position can be sustained only by proving one of two things: Either (1) that the rites of phallicism were not obscene orgies, or (2) that obscene orgies are not harmful. We will devote a few paragraphs, in as cleanly a manner as possible, to the consideration of the subject.

First, we will quote from Johnson's Cyclopedia, about as fair a book of reference as we hav. It finds the origin of phallic worship to hav been "the adoration of the reproductiv and regenerativ powers of nature, represented after a time by the phallus, or male generativ organ, or in some instances by a straight column or by the pistil of a flower, as in India at the present day. This worship, whatever of symbolism it may hav had at first, rapidly became a most corrupt and intolerable practice. It prevailed in India (as at present), in Chaldea, Egypt, Syria, Phrygia, Greece, and Rome, as in later days among some of the American savages, notably the Seminoles of Florida. The forms which this abomination assumed were innumerable. Dionysus, Hermes, Venus, Priapus, Pan, Isis, and other gods were worshiped at Rome by phallic symbolism."

Second. In the worship of the Linga and Yoni among the ancients, the Linga symbolizing the sun and the Yoni the earth, there was "nothing gross or immoral, when the subject is properly understood; but the "purity" was of short duration, for "in the kingdoms, both of Judah and Israel, the rites connected with these emblems assumed their most corrupting forms" (Bible Myths, p. 47).

Third. We will quote from the chapter on Phallicism in D. M. Bennett's "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." Mr. Bennett used the best works as authorities, as we, who supplied the books from which, in the disease-laden atmosphere of Albany prison, he wrote his greatest work, can witness to. "Comparativly recent investigations," he says, "hav demonstrated that among all the ancient peoples, as is the case among those who to-day reproduce for us so many of their manners and customs—we mean, of course, modern savages and barbarians and the semi-civilized nations—this phallic philosophy and religion reigned supreme. Both the Aryan and the Semitic branches of the white race were about equally tinctured or infected with it."

And what is this worship which all nations hav participated in at one or another period of their existence? What deities typified their religions? And what were the rites used to express their pious feelings? The worship was phallic, and their deities were "nothing more nor less than nasty phallic deities, corresponding to the low tone and taste of their ignorant, bigoted, and [mark the word] disgustingly lascivious adorers. . . . Most of the Bible names are intensely and obscenely phallic." And what of the rites? We will quote the least objectionable account of the method of conducting ancient Brahmanical worship. Mr. Bennett's authority was Wilson's "Essays on the Religion of the Hindoos." He remarks that "the worshipers of the Sacti—the power or energy of the Divine Nature in action—are exceedingly numerous among all classes of Hindoos—about three fourths are of this sect. . . . In accordance with the weakness of human nature, there are many who consider it right to pay their devotions to the thing itself rather than to an abstraction. . . . The ceremonies are mostly gone through in a mixed society, the Sacti being personified by a naked female, to whom meat and wine are offered and then distributed amongst the company. These eat and drink alternately with gesticulations and mantras [monosyllabic prayers or incantations]; and when the religious part of the business is over, the males and females rush together and indulge in a wild orgy." "What is most lamentably ludicrous," adds the imprisoned author, "about the sacred Sactian orgies of feasting, drinking, and copulating is that when the veins are 'full of rich blood from the banquet,' and the actors urged to do whatever desire dictates, they are never to be so carried away by their zeal as to neglect the holy prayers appropriate to every stage of the liturgy for the occasion. For instance, they hav special prayers prescribed for their use, (1) when the parts are to be purified prior to proceeding to extremities, (2) when they are introduced to each other, (3) in the agitation which follows, and (4) when the ceremony is completed!

Everything is done, as our Ritualists would apostolically say, 'decently and in order.'"

But we hav pursued this subject far enough. Volumes hav been written upon Phallism, explaining it, condemning it, or apologizing for it, tracing its connection with and influence upon modern superstitions, but all agree that however "pure" it may hav been in its inception, it very quickly degenerated into disgusting practices. That these practices were not harmful, as Mr. Anthony seems disposed to maintain, is preposterous. Vice is always injurious, physically and mentally, and indulgence in it is not any the less injurious when done in the name of religion. We do not care to argue Mr. Anthony's implied statement that obscene orgies are not harmful. There are a few things in the world we regard as settled, and that is one of them.

But what an inconsistent truth seeker our friend is! Because we implied a truth that conflicts with his notions, he does his best to break us down. So far as his power goes, he intends to suppress the medium that brought him the distasteful intelligence. Is that his Freethought? Is that his Liberalism? Knowledge is necessary to the acquisition of wisdom. Our knowledge of phallism seems to be superior to that of Mr. Anthony. We told the truth. Which, then, is the wiser teacher, he or THE TRUTH SEEKER? And which more likely to giv the people "the light and truth they stand in need of?" We can discontinue THE TRUTH SEEKER to Mr. Anthony. We wish we could at the same time take away his narrowness and destroy his bigotry.

Missionaries Needed in Montreal.

Freethought teachers are urgently required in Montreal, if freedom of speech is desired in that city. For a most disgraceful scene occurred there on the evening of the 5th inst. "Father" Chiniquy, the expriest, attempted to lecture in Russell Hall, but he was driven from the platform by a howling mob of Catholics, and his life was imperilled by flying glass and stones. The hall was packed by the lecturer's opponents, who stood on the seats and window-sills, howling derisivly whenever the lecturer attempted to make himself heard. There was a strong police force present in anticipation of trouble, but it was unable to preserve order. The lecturer appealed to the police to clear the hall, which they finally accomplished. A few of Chiniquy's friends remained with a view of protecting him. The riotous proceedings broke out afresh, the mob throwing stones through the windows and causing considerable damage. Several of those in the building were injured, and to prevent further assault the lights were turned out. The crowd, not being able to see the inmates, then contented themselvs with firing at random, and threatening to kill Father Chiniquy. Carriages were summoned, and while the police beat back the crowd with their batons, the lecturer and his friends entered them and were rapidly driven off. No arrests were made, the police pretending to be unable to detect the parties engaged in the stone-throwing.

Chiniquy is an ex-priest who is going round exposing the moral rottenness and murderous tyranny of the Catholic church. For this he has been several times publicly assaulted by the minions of popery, and narrowly escaped with his life. The priests who remain in the church hate him bitterly, more bitterly even than they do Freethought lecturers. He is exposing their secrets, acquainting the people with the means used by them to keep themselvs in place. He is, therefore, a very dangerous man to hav at large, and did they dare, or could they compass his death without detection, they soon would hav him under the sod.

Catholicism is a standing menace to the peace of Canada, and a constant drag upon her prosperity. We are glad to know that the comparativly few Freethinkers in the provinces are awake to the necessities of the times, and determined to organize in a manner sufficiently strong to be able to thwart the church should she attempt any new governmental deviltry.

No, We Didn't Take On Butler.

From Pittsburgh Truth.

On October 4th we beheld Man and the New York TRUTH SEEKER united. The consolidation, we are told, was brought about after a "general Liberal counseling to merge Man with some other paper, and thus make one thriftier blade of journalism where two struggling ones grew before." While we hav many reasons to regret the death of Man, we are glad to know that its "immortality" will occasionally materalize. Under the circumstances we consider the union a good journalistic move, and wish our highly esteemed TRUTH SEEKER double success in the future. We presume Butler was merged too.

Editorial Notes.

JUST to giv Talmage a dose of his own medicin, we quote his recent arraignment of Infidelity, substituting Christianity where he said Infidellty:

"Ah! Christianity, stand up and take thy sentence! In the presence of God, and angels, and men, stand up, thou monster, thy lip blasted with blasphemy, thy cheek scarred with lust, thy breath foul with the corruption of the ages! Stand up, Satyr, filthy goat, buzzard of the nations, leper of the centuries! Stand up, thou monster Christianity! Part man, part panther, part reptil, part dragon, stand up and take thy sentence! Thy hands red with the blood in which thou hast washed; thy feet crimson with the human gore through which thou hast waded, stand up and take thy sentence! Down with thee to the pit, and sup on the sobs and groans of families thou hast blasted, and roll on the bed of knives which thou hast sharpened for others, and let thy music be the everlasting miserere of those whom thou hast damned! I brand the forehead of Christianity with all the crimes of self-immolation for the last century on the part of those who had their reason."

If an Infidel had said this as it stands now, what a howl would hav gone up from the Christian pulpit. And it fits Christianity very closely, while not a word is applicable to Infidelity.

REV. DR. CURRY recently said: "Our people do not see as they should that the principles of Christianity must enter into statesmanship. In our protest against the union of church and state we hav fallen into the error of separating Christianity from these great principles. The most remarkable exhibit of the appliance of Christian principles is, of course, in Gladstone. He has the courage to stand up in the House of Commons and say that a certain course of action is wrong because it is in opposition to Christianity. In that particular, Senator Joseph E. Brown stands by Gladstone. He does in the United States Senate just that. He bases his action upon the Bible as the word of God, and appeals to it not simply as authoritativ, but as conclusiv of the whole question. Although this a Christian country (so-called), very few of our public men hav the courage or disposition to do as Gladstone and Brown do in this regard." en ator Brown is one of the lessees of the prison gangs of Georgia, and as he is, is responsible for the continuance of the brutal system of management of negro convicts. His Christianity is shown by his deeds. His creed for the Senate is one thing; his creed for the convict another. The church is responsible for such infamies as are perpetrated in Georgia by Christian statesmen in the name of law.

THE Freethinkers of Melbourne, Australia, led by the intrepid Joseph Symes, hav won the right to hold meetings on Sundays and charge admissions. Under the old theater license act, this privilege had been denied, and the meetings had either to be discontinued or supported entirely by contributions, which method made the burden heavy on a few. This victory is a sore blow to the bigots of the churches, who had relied on this act to prevent the teaching on Sunday of Atheism, and their organs are casting about for another weapon. One, the Daily Telegraph, says that Sunday trading laws are still in force, and calls upon the police to use them against Mr. Symes and his friends. To this the editor of the Liberator retorts: "Well, we do not object, if all are treated alike. Let us hav the same sauce for goose and gander. The Daily Telegraph, of course, does not receive any telegrams during Sunday; never gets matter ready on Sunday for Monday's issue; never is a leader written for that godly paper on Sunday, to appear next morning; nobody lights the fire or gets the engin ready to print Monday's issue until the holy Sabbath is past, of course; no reporter ever reports a Sunday sermon or lecture or a railway accident for the Daily Telegraph; and the thought of the paper never enters the editor's devout brain on a Sunday! The utter hypocrisy of Sabbath observance amongst English and colonial people cannot be surpassed. Still, we hope the laws against Sunday trading will be enforced. We do not mind being made the first victims. Let the bigots try. We want to see the Sunday free, and the museums, etc., open to the poor on that day; we wish to see other places of amusements open to the public as well as churches and chapels. And the revival of the Sunday trading laws would do more to destroy the puritanical restrictions upon people's actions than anything else we could suggest—except popular common sense. We hope the police will be egged on to do their worst."

THE scholars of the church are digging away its foundations. Rev. Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, of England, has published a work entitled, "The Common Tradition of the Synoptic Gospels in the Text of the Revised Version." Dr. Abbott finds in the narrativ of Mark indications of personal knowledge of the facts he relates. He holds that there was an early tradition which Mark embodies wholly in his gospel, while Matthew and Luke only borrow part of it. He concludes that nothing belongs to the body of the original gospel "tradition" which is not to be found in the gospel of Mark. Dr. Abbott does not claim inspiration in the evangelical sense. "When we were children," he says, "we could not stop short of desiring to believe that the whole of the letter of the Bible was absolutely true. . . . Now we must be content to accept part." The Sunday-school Times considers the book unfit for popular use on account of its naturalistic tendencies and its lack of any real recognition of the divine element in scripture. It then turns to the printed text of the "tradition" and says: "The first lack we notice in the account is that of the miraculous birth of our Lord. . . Mark givs no account of the birth of Christ, and therefore, on Dr. Abbott's theory, the story of the nativity formed no part of the original 'tradition.' In the same way the narrativ of the resurrection is reduced (Mark xvi, 9-20 being omitted as not forming part of the original text of the gospel) to the appearance of the angels, and the announcement that Christ had risen. These are certainly extraordinary results, and alone they would be sufficient to justify doubt of the validity of Dr. Abbott's method of reading the original 'tradition.' . . . If criticism has made anything probable, it is this, that the supposed original draft, oral or written, is irrecoverable, and that it may hav contained much that does not appear in Mark or any other single gospel, while much of it may be included in all three evangelists in wholly divergent phraseology." This cautious admission does away with the sanctity of the four gospels. The "tradition," it is admitted, may hav been oral, in which case it was colored by every man who repeated it, and its actual character is now unknown. The Essenes, to whom Christ belonged, were a despised sect of Christians. Aryan Christianity, which sprung from them, held Christ to be a man only. They had no necessity for miraculous birth, or for a resurrection against the laws of nature. The myths of the gospels were invented by other men. Whatever literature they had was heretical, and, in accordance with the rule of the church, was destroyed, and the Aryans declared and punished as heretics. Whether Christ disparaged learning or not, his professed followers did, and in the name of the cross they burnt heretics and heretical books. Hence the life of Christ, and the history of the early church, is almost a blank. Hence Christian scholars are compelled to admit that the historical basis of their religion is irrecoverably gone. From this they shrink. To be honest, they must admit that their gospels are the work of men, that they do not tell one and the same story, that they hav no certain foundation; that if they abandon the miraculous, their Christ is convicted of being but a man, whose words as spoken are irrecoverably lost. No wonder they warn the public that Dr. Abbott's book is dangerous, and unfit for popular use. A few centuries ago it would hav been burnt by the common hangman, and its author compelled to recant or perish at the stake.

George Chainey's Lecture at Paine Hall.

From the Investigator.

Last Sunday afternoon Mr. George Chainey lectured on this subject: "How and Why I Became a Spiritualist. Will also reply to his critics."

The hall was well filled; admittance ten cents; and the singing, which was very good, was the best part of the meeting, for the lecture was a mixture of various things, including copious quotations from Shakspere—the whole delivered in a ministerial tone and manner. His religious experience as a Methodist and Unitarian was first given, and as they proved unsatisfactory to him he drifted into Materialism, which, not being sufficiently constructiv, progressiv, and reformatory to meet the demands of his enthusiasm, he got discouraged and abandoned it. Afterwards, at Horticultural Hall, he tried his hand at Ethicalism, and that, too, proved a failure.

In this uneasy and forlorn frame of mind (quoting from Hamlet, "How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable seem to me all the uses of this world!" etc.), almost deciding to become a tragedian, for which business he thought he was fitted, he strayed into the Cassadaga Spiritual camp-meeting, more from curiosity than any other motiv. But unexpectedly, when there, he saw some writing on slates, together with clairvoyance, materializations, and in the night felt little hands, soft as velvet, tenderly caressing his face, and then a luminous light streamed through his brain. It was enough. Conviction followed instantaneously; and this was how and why he became a Spiritualist.

Speaking of his critics, he said they had abused him shamefully, but as he called them a set of illiberal bigots, ignoramuses, and "slop-buckets," perhaps he got even with them in the line of retaliation. We are not aware, however, that any Liberals hav abused him, or tried to prevent him from leaving their ranks, or feel any enmity at his apostasy or conversion, provided he is sure that he is on the right track now and will stay there, for Spiritualism is the next best thing to Materialism.

We hav listened to Mr. Chainey in former years when we thought he did very well, and hav praised him as he deserved. But last Sunday he appeared to us to be decidedly weak, as if, like some other new mediums, his conditions were not favorable. His evidence for Spiritualism was as feeble as his allusions to his critics were uncandid and uncivil, for he made most abusiv assertions against them which we know are incorrect. For example, he said our discussion meeting (meaning the Liberal Club) is merely an arena for personal quarreling. This was said ignorantly or wilfully, for we never knew him to attend even one of its discussions during the two years that he lived in the city. He is not, therefore, a competent judge of what they are.

He also made another wild assertion, that we here mention, because what is said in a public meeting may be alluded to in a public paper. He stated that he had been told repeatedly by Colonel Ingersoll that he (the colonel) was sick of lecturing on Liberalism, and that he would not giv another lecture were it not that he wanted money! We do not believe that Colonel Ingersoll, the honored and sincere president of the National Liberal League, is a man of this hypocritical and mercenary stamp, and want better evidence of it than George Chainey's unsupported assertion.

Letters from Friends.

GOOD-BYE, CHAINEY.

BURR OAK, MICH., Nov. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I formerly had as good an opinion of Mr. Chainey as any lecturer in the field. When he accepted Spiritualism, before his first address, I was satisfied that he would not work in harmony with the League officers, but I did not question his sincerity, and I felt no diminution of sympathy for him. But everybody has heard about that last straw and the poor old camel. Charity is a grand thing, but I hav none to waste on a man who persistently repels it. In Mr. Chainey's reply to Mr. Putnam, after speaking of the proposed debate with Mr. Watts, he says, "I did not open this controversy." Now, without any circumlocution or euphemism, when Mr. Chainey wrote that he knew it was not true. My respect for him has grown so small that it is hardly discernible. Suppose Mr. Watts did announce that he would reply, he certainly would not hav replied if Mr. Chainey had said nothing to reply to. This contemptible effort to shift the responsibility for the commencement of the discussion on to Mr. Watts showed what kind of argument the latter may expect if he ever holds a debate with Mr. Chainey. Here is another paragraph: "If, when I had said my say, Mr. Wakeman had said his strongest word for Positivism without trying to ridicule me, and Mr. Watts for Materialism without directing most of his argument against me personally, all would hav been well." That is the most monumental piece of arrogance and impudence I hav seen in print for many a day. In other words, Mr. Chainey should be allowed to say what he pleases, but Mr. Wakeman and Mr. Watts must suppress their sentiments unless they chime with Mr. Chainey's. Then witness this enthusiast's pueril quibble to avoid the charge that he had acted like Moody. As if a man could not adopt Moody's style and methods without pleading for the divinity of Jesus! He treats Mr. Putnam to about half a column of worn-out twaddle about the beauties of Supernaturalism and the horrors of Materialism. This stuff would be fitly characterized by his own term, "tissue tawdry." Any unprejudiced person who has read Mr. Chainey's Cassadaga address and his public utterances since must easily see where the trouble arose. His mind was filled with distorted and magnified images of anticipated ridicule, and he determined to hav the first word. He saw a place in his pathway where a lion might be lying, ready to spring upon him, and he concluded to giv a blow with his weapon that would kill the beast if it should happen to be there, and if not, he would be none the worse. That was his grand mistake. No matter what his former experience had been, he had no right to defend himself from charges that had not been made, nor to make insulting statements which could not fail to appear personal, whatever may hav been their real meaning. He has unnecessarily exposed the baser side of his own nature, without creating a particle of that sympathy for which he so much craves, or promoting the cause of Spiritualism. He says he has made no charge against Materialism that he cannot substantiate. That is a plain statement. If he can prove those charges, he is morally bound to do so, without any reference to a debate with Mr. Watts or anybody else. Now, Mr. Chainey, we hav a record of your charges, and we shall see whether they are proved or not. I hav some curiosity to see Mr. Chainey's alleged proofs, as I passed from orthodoxy to Agnosticism, and my experience, so far as the tendency to sensualism and recklessness is concerned, is exactly the reverse of his. I could easily show the absurdity of Mr. Chainey's logic, but I forbear. In regard to the debate, I hope it will not take place; not because I hav any fears for the result, but because it would be too far beneath Mr. Watts to hold a debate with such a man as George Chainey.

N. G. W.

STONEHAM, MASS., Nov. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I read with interest your editorial on the proposed Chainey-Watts debate. You are right in saying that the Spiritualist belief is "purely a question of personal feeling." I would add the words and evidence. Evidence to one mind is trash to another. I am rather sorry the debate could not occur. Debates rarely convince, but they arouse thought. Secularism and Spiritualism, like other "isms," affect people according to their organizations. Secularism, with its broad range of work to be done, fills the mentality of some, and outlines even more than we can accomplish on earth. To others who only ask to be assured of immortality, Spiritualism answers through its phenomenal, biblical, philosophical, or devotional phases. Others hav every want supplied through other sources. "The love of Jesus fully satisfies me;" "My Bible is always a comfort;" and "I want nothing but to love God," are oft-repeated expressions. These ideas would be a coffin to me, but to some they serve as an infinit realm.

I am glad Mr. Chainey is convinced of the beyond, and that his eloquence will be devoted to it. I fear he will meet with some disappointments among us, if I understand his lecture. He will find some Spiritualists who are not prepared to relinquish cigars, beer, etc.; even those who receive angels (or think they do) every hour, and some who commune with ardent as well as divine "spirits." It only proves that beliefs hav tendencies to good or evil; but moral responsibility, moral organization—in other words, manhood and womanhood—alone make people really better. Whatever stimulates this is what individuals really need. He will also find that among our societies, a few generally hav to bear the burdens, while the many are idle or else tell "how it ought to be done." He will find that some of our societies will not feel too cheerful when asked "$35.00 and expenses" for one lecture, even if they are not "mere negationists." New thoughts are rarely born in luxury and amid roses. Spiritualism is not an exception. I know veterans in this belief who hav sacrificed, toiled, and stood alone when moral cowards in the same belief consulted policy and selfishness. We owe our success to the few heroes and heroins of thirty-five years ago; some of whom never received the thanks of those they blessed.

We are now numerically strong. The elegant temple in Boston will bring out the "summer soldiers" and add to our popularity. Proof of our strength is in the fact of our many divisions, some being as conservativ as theology, and looking contemptuously upon Freethought and its advocates; others are thorough Freethinkers. I think some of our best speakers hav been ostracised, and nearly or quite silenced, because truth was to them more important than their "ism."

We cannot avoid the laws of nature, and so we grow. We are not created, but evoluted, and it takes time. We build the ladder by which we rise, and some of us are slow workers. I believe enough to save a nation, but I don't know enough to save myself from daily mistakes. I hope to hear that Mrs. Slenker found some mental wheat amid the tests, though she has not been convinced of so-called "spirit phenomena." My letter is too long already, so I will simply add I cannot get along without your paper, and feel as proud of your success and liberality as if you were my own boy.

Your sister truth seeker, C. FANNIE ALLYN.

CASSADAGA ISLAND, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow us space to express appreciation of Mr. Putnam's position on the Watts and Chainey affair, and to offer a few statements? Mr. Putnam goes to the bottom of the matter, which should suit every unbiased person. Mr. Chainey was warmly welcomed by the Spiritualists at the camp-meeting, and when evidence came to him which satisfied him of spirit intercouse, his further stay in its associativ relations exposed him to adverse criticism from many of them. It made him sore. The Freethinkers' meeting came on with him in this state; we suppose he had to express his feelings in some way. None had, in public, referred to him; he had no opportunity to vindicate himself before the spiritual meeting, so some of us think his expressed feeling was due more to this state of mind than to any offenses of his old associates. Mr. Chainey seems to forget his old friend, Mr. Watts, defended him from the aspersions of his new allies. Mr. Chainey acts like a whipped child, and seems to show more wounded vanity than outraged affection. When Mr. Wakeman exposed something of the ridiculous side of Spiritualism, we did not refer it to Mr. Chainey personally; we were all alike partners in it. As expositors of Spiritualism we are illy fitted for our work if ridicule breaks our back. It's the truth, so it seems to us, which Mr. Chainey is sensitiv to, and if that is what he needs, he had better stop crying and begin again, as a man with a man.

As a medium, we might say he is taking a dose of Spiritualism to fit him for the stage, rather than the church; and as a lecturer, with a long and wide experience, we say, Lose yourself in your work, defend principles and facts in public—and forget Chainey, if you can, for a time. After a few years' fitting up in the ups and downs, and roundings out, and widenings off of Spiritualism, you will see work of the workers is to help fit humanity to find heaven within them on earth, and to cease their Christian crying for a better sphere; that death is not to be dreaded or longed for. Spiritualism is not a religion, not a philosophy; it's the fixedness of correlativ facts, pertaining to man's impressional nature, beyond the ordinary range of his normal action; opens a wide field of experience; is independent of moralities or religions, but which affect all relations of life. The Spiritualist may be a Jew, Christian, Buddhist, or Mohammedan, as far as religion is concerned; most of them hav none. Material science is to giv Spiritualism its knowledge of methods in varied departments of nature. Spiritualism would go to seed in superstition and a church again, if it were not for the progress of Materialism, and its progress is the safety-valve of the coming humanity. I take full stock in it for uses; if I had to lose its unfoldments, I should lose my Spiritualism. I could not expose the law of relation of my spiritual facts, or find a spirit body to survive death.

Enthusiasm, as a working factor, is but a summer friend; joined to energy, foresight, business tact, and with infinit patience, it is a good friend to hav; but with these powers, and in love with our work, we can do without it, and accomplish very much for our cause. Mr. Chainey's culture, added to such qualities, if he hav them, will giv him fair success without them. Spiritualism will be a greater drag to-day, for him to carry, than Materialism; our coming lecturers hav got to be scientific rather than literary.

The accepted moral teaching of the Materialist is that of the Spiritualist. Nature's laws determin man's needs and methods of supply; equalization or harmony comes by living in all capacities of our nature. All are alike sacred. Heaven has no more than earth to giv man. This has been the text of spiritual lecturing; Mr. Chainey can hav found no more. Love in the human is attraction; in inanimate formation, it's a centripetal force. Repulsion, its opposit, is centrifugal. Within these forces reason is a continuity of impulses, determins our equilibrium or morality; by the life of feeling we develop our reason; our angles of attraction are many; duties are varied; necessities constant; reason becomes the sum total of all sensed or expressed, is the mouthpiece of our morality. The person who has the widest circumference in perception, has the firmest center of impulsing nature, the strongest loves, duties, or obligatory relations—must needs liv in them ideally, if not practically. Materialism, from this base, works for human needs, as does the Spiritualist; we work alike to unfold nature's revealments, that we may prove heaven possible here. It's the present uses of this morality which is offered alike by us, as substitute for a religious heaven hereafter, with a prostituted earth career; as we hav no cosy places laid up in heaven, more than or earth, our attained results are material benefits.

We think Mr. Putnam takes so true and generous a position that the thanks of all considerate Spiritualists are due him. We do not fear our cause will suffer if we hav no such debate. Many of us felt disappointed in Mr. Chainey's procedure. We thought if he had kept on smoking till the meetings were over, "always and forever," he might hav been clearer. The sudden changes he had made all around unfitted him for correctness in action. We gave him the right hand of fellowship as a Liberalist when he came to Cassadaga, and, as a Spiritualist co-worker, this criticism for the good of the cause at this date.

Kindly, MRS. H. T. STEARNS.

POMONA, CAL., Oct 30, 284.

MR. EDITOR: It has often been said in my hearing that religion, as practiced by the people of this world, was a terrible good thing to hav in the family, as well as for the community at large. They claim that it is a bar to crime with the more ignorant of humanity. Let us illustrate by stating facts as they work in California. A Catholic steals a horse, is caught, or anticipated by the priest. Priest tells Mr. Horsethief that before he can eradicate this mote from his muddled character, he (Mr. Horsethief) must make restitution before he (the priest) can settle with the boss up above—"the giver of every perfect blessing." All right says, Mr. Horsethief, pays the priestly fee, and again goes about his business and steals two more horses; forgets to say anything to the priest about the last steal, and it slips his memory to pay the owner of the horses for them. Goes off to some distant camp, sells the horses, comes out one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars ahead, don't need to confess (as the priest has not found out the discrepancy yet) or pay for the property until the day he dies (or is hung). The priest and the man from whom the horses were stolen are the losers, as Mr. Horsethief has become bankrupt in his efforts to evade the sheriff. But Mr. Horsethief and priest meet on a level (on the gallows generally) to adjust the crookedness of the "dear soul," and procure his ticket past hell and on to glory—on to the New Jerusalem—to the mansion in the skies, expressly prepared for all that love and obey the king of glory. The priest examins the culprit, and finds him chockful of faith, and religion oozing out of every pore—"slopping over" with the stuff. The jackstaff of superstition is brought to view by the robed priest, to guide him on to the realms of bliss—the home of the saints (reserved seat for one). This I believe is the Catholic modus operandi.

The Protestant method is a little more simple; works better under a Republican form of government; somewhat shorter route; kind of cross lots. Mr. Horsethief can steal all the horses he can, murder, rob, fill the whole catalog of crimes, and when caught, or about to be hung, quietly pass the bloody shirt up to Jesus, and ask him (with plenty of faith) to wash it out according to his blessed promis, hang it up to dry on the endless clothes line that surrounds the heavonly promenade, ironed out smooth and white by the "son of rightousness" (of the king's laundry), ready to clothe the culprit on his arrival at Saint's Harbor. "Blessed privilege" (for the bad man), but a little tough on the Infidel. The Protestant route has the advantage of economy, and insures secrecy, as there is none to "giv him away," and, from recent statistics, about as many criminals go that way, including the parson, as go the other. The Protestant has the greater variety of routes and boats. He can take his choice without paying a cent, if he puts off arranging for passage until the boat is about to start; it not being necessary to bring any recommendations of moral character from the late scenes of operations, as the kind or character of past occupation has no bearing upon the statutes of the people in a supernatural state. Everything goes there. Once you get there, and no "questions asked." Kind of a "free-and-easy life." Even hypocrits (while they were here) will not be interrogated as to their methods of exit. No notice will be taken of the damned in hell by the "lucky dog" that miraculously escaped, as they ought to hav known better, for they hav divine faith versus human law and common sense continually presented for their candid judgment and consideration by the learned and unlearned agents of divinity, that are continually getting humanity into difficulties in this world. These birds of prey are a nuisance here. They nor their religion are any bar to crime. Their methods of rescuing the race through the blood of Christ is a fraud—too thin even for a Spiritualist—in order that they may maintain their too long established hold upon unthinking, superstitious humanity.

I wish to say a word to the many writers of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the topic of politics. We cannot afford to loosen our hold on the clergy for one moment, to engage in any political discussions. We must not divide our forces for side issues until the demon, the god of superstition, is dethroned. We should not engage in any family quarrels until we hav at least whipped the devil, and mortally scared the other fellow—the alleged author of the devil. Then, and not until then, will we be able to get civil liberty for our race. No candidate for the presidency, that has a ghost of a show for election, dares at this time to express himself in the least favorable to our cause. When the chains of superstition are broken and lie loose at the feet of the people, then we can rattle them in the ears of candidates. Let us be a unit in driving the nails in the coffin of orthodoxy, in order that we may hasten the corpse to its burial; get its putrid carcass forever out of sight, that it may cease to infect and disease the human mind longer, thereby causing pain and misery to the noblest of our race, blighting peace, happiness, and comfort while they liv, and offering in its stead the sickly hope of eternal separation of loved ones in the "beyond." Away with such shams, that we may enjoy the realities that are. H. L. SHAUG.

WENTWORTH, DAK., Oct. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is with the utmost pleasure that I sit down to write this letter, as it seems to an old friend. Allow me to say these few words through the columns of our noble friend of humanity, THE TRUTH SEEKER, in commemoration of one of the noblest works ever installed in our little western town. I refer to the course of three lectures just given by Professor W. F. Jamieson. Owing to the busy time of the year, our farmers could not attend generally, but nevertheless we had good round numbers; and right here let me say, if there is such a being as a nobleman of nature, Professor Jamieson is one of them. The solid truths, the profound utterances, the plain illustrations, and the happy mode of expression as he handled his batteries of grape-shot in the midst of the enemy, are simply astounding. No man with any degree of common sense can sit and listen to his utterances without feeling that his hope of heaven is gone unless he makes it for himself, and in behalf of my many Freethought friends, allow me to express our heartfelt gratitude to Professor Jamieson for the good work he has accomplished. I say accomplished, for there is no question of doubt in my mind that the work is effectiv. The evening of our last lecture the hall was decorated with flowers, and behind the speaker hung the portrait of that noble martyr, Thomas Paine, wreathed in flowers. As near as I can learn, this decoration was done by a lady that only last Sunday morning allowed her doors to be thrown open and her rooms used for a Sunday-school and preaching. This has been the feeling throughout the whole course. At the close of the last lecture a meeting of Freethinkers was called, and a committee appointed and instructed to make the necessary arrangements for a second course of lectures by Mr. Jamieson, and also to take steps toward the organization of a Liberal League. I never saw people who seemed to be so hungry for food of thought as manifested during these lectures. It seemed as if they could not bear the idea of allowing the professor to stop for even a short breath. The Bible is a trap. Jamieson sprung the trap and he caught them all. Please send me a few extra copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER with the reports of our lectures in them, so I can hand them to our friends and show them that the good deeds go on record, not in a mythical heaven, but in the hearts of a true friend of Freethought and reform. W. L. HORTON.

DIAMOND, Mo., Oct. 26, A.S. 284.

MR. EDITOR: No one regrets the intrusion of politics into THE TRUTH SEEKER columns more than I do; but, as it seems to be a free pitch in, would you kindly permit an Abolitionist and ex-Republican (but one who, because he does not feel disposed to curse the Southern people with sufficient vim, is, at present, dubbed "a d——d rebel") to hav a voice in the melee. I was in Labette county, Kansas, when that influx of negroes from the Southern states, that Brother Willis so feelingly alludes to, took place.

It seems that some evil-disposed person or persons, in order to procure the negro vote for the Republican party in Kansas, caused a report to be circulated throughout Texas, Louisiana, and other Southern states, that if the negroes could only reach Kansas, each male adult would be presented, by Gov. St. John, with forty acres of land and a mule. Prompted by the delusiv hopes inspired by this yarn, they abandoned their means of subsistence at home, and flocked in swarms and legions to their fancied Eldorado, only to learn, too late, that they were the victims of a plot, that the promises made them were like those of Macbeth's witches, "kept to the ear, but broken to the hope." Kansas was literally inundated with the colored element. With meager supplies, and feeble chance of employment at renumerativ wages, they were, to a great extent, thrown upon the charities of the people. With insufficient food and clothing, their suffering during the winter was intense. Every man, Republican or Democrat, with a spark of pity in his heart, denounced in scathing epithets the infernal swindle practiced upon an innocent people. For cool, calculating cruelty for political ends, the annals of this nation afford no parallel in infamy to this. It towers above all other political schemes, unique and damnable. Brother Willis must be woefully ignorant of the facts in connection with this colored hegira, to cite it as a campaign pointer in behalf of his party.

And again, in reply to Brother Willis's question as to whether any Democrat has paid the penalty of the crime of murdering a Republican. Garland Mann, a Democrat of Newton county, Mo., is now in prison awaiting the execution of the sentence of death for the murder of Dr. Chenoworth, a Republican, convicted upon circumstantial evidence at that. As a mere "looker on in Venice," this continual abuse and vilification of the Southern people is becoming very nauseating to me. In Irish lingo, "enough is as good as a feast," and I am stuffed to satiety. This persistent trampling upon a people who acknowledged defeat is hardly generous, to say the least. In the estimation of some people it doesn't even savor of bravery. Germany obtained the ascendency over France, and Russia over Turkey, but I hav yet to hear of either of those dominant powers abusing their advantage to anything like the extent which is practiced here.

Wouldn't it be well enough to halt before this policy of alienation is carried too far? This nation is not so powerful as to enjoy a certain immunity against all attacks from without. The navy is said to be in a dilapidated condition. Some fine day Uncle Sam may find himself in a muss with an outsider and need all the force available. In such a contingency, if every man North and South felt in duty bound to shoulder his musket and "rally round the standard," "'twere a consummation devoutly to be wished." "Unity is strength," why not strive to foster it? Horace Greely felt the force of this maxim when he went South to bail Jeff Davis. So did Rutherford B. Hayes when he carried the olive branch to the South, and to smooth the asperities of the period said: "When Greek meets Greek, the victory is with those who hav the most Greeks." Magnanimous words! If I mistake not, the Southern states lent efficient aid in the revolution, as also in the war of 1812. Perhaps they did a little in the Mexican Campaign, too; and in the language of D. F. Howard, "We met them in battle, and found them well worthy of our steel." Is it manly or chivalrous to trample upon such a people forever, with the unrelenting cruelty of the orthodox divinity? A nobler spirit should actuate Liberals.

The Dutchman, when remonstrated with for pounding his adversary when he was down, exclaimed: "Dot ish ter time to pound him," and the persecution of the last twenty years smacks of the same spirit. Then, as to the stigma of ignorance and proscription imputed to the South, I hav yet to meet the Southern man who couldn't reciprocate any information I could giv him with something equally valuable. As a rule they are a modest people, and do not lay claim to the vast mental caliber and esthetic "culchaw" of some of their traducers; those animated encyclopedias whose store-houses of knowledge are crammed to the ridge-pole. I would say to all those erudite savants, and their number is legion (I meet them at every turn, and the woods is full of 'em), Be tolerant of ignorance; at least, temper justice with mercy. You don't know it quite all, my friends. Maybe Darwin could giv you a point in evolution, or Thomson in mathematics. There might be a passage in Hesiod or Telemachus that would baffle you. Why, I met one of these intolerant savants the other night, and he couldn't point out the constellation Orion.

Depend upon it, my astute and learned friends, until you know it all, you are comparativly ignorant, and some fellow is liable to regard you with contempt for your meager attainments; so be tolerant of ignorance. As to proscription, I hav never met the slightest traces of it here, except in the case of my landlord, a Republican, trying, recently, to bulldoze me into voting his ticket. I am an open, pronounced Liberal, and hav met no molestation in any way; nothing but kindness and neighborly friendship. A man might inaugurate devil-worship here without fear of interference. Well, perhaps I hav writtten too much, but naught in malice.

Yours, JOS. TOWSLEY.

BOULDER CREEK, CAL., Oct. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I expect you hav about come to the conclusion that that fellow Worley is becoming very lukewarm on the subject of Freethought, but perhaps a better acquaintance with me, and my surroundings and conditions, would hav a tendency to cause you to conclude differently. I was raised in the state of Tennessee, in slavery times, by enthusiastic Christian Methodist slaveholding parents and relativs, but was always opposed to slavery. I came to this state at the age of twenty-five, a very doubting member of the Methodist church. Freethought literature had been so completely suppressed in the South that, with the exception of a badly mutilated copy of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," half missing, which I found in the rubbish of a vacated back-yard, I had never met with any Freethought literature; and when curiosity led me to pick up that little old remnant of a book and examin its title page, I was astonished that even that piece of a one should hav escaped the glances of the Christian destroyer, for I had been taught that it was a thing so dangerous in its very nature as to make it the duty of all good people to place with vengeance their heel upon its head as they would a poisonous adder, and then make short work of it by committing it to the flames; but the spirit of our old mythical mother was roused in me. I wanted to taste of the forbidden fruit; I wanted to know for myself; I wanted a demonstration. I had had nothing but hearsay evidence upon the matter. So I took it with me, as one would a dose of poison which he designed administering to himself in test doses, to a desert place, and read it, and when I had done I thought, "Well, and this is the great pit which the devil has dug to catch folks in, is it? It don't look so to me. I don't see anything so bad in it. The man is a great reasoner; he aims at the truth; his motivs seem to be good; his reasoning sound; and that is more than I can conscientiously say of the orthodox books I hav read. Well, I must see more of it. If I ever hav an opportunity, I must hav all of that man's works. I am going to take the chances on eating the forbidden fruit and becoming as the gods, knowing good and evil, for the truth is, I hav got to think that there is but little risk to run. I don't see but that these people they call Infidels are just as good, if not better, than those who call themselvs Christians." Thus, at about eighteen, I commenced evoluting into one of those dreadful things called Infidels. For over thirty years I hav been an outspoken one. I delivered the first Infidel lecture I know of having been delivered this side of the Rockies, in 1853, at Spanish Flat, Eldorado county, this state. I might say I was converted in 1851, as since that time I hav stood up in defense of it on all occasions. I never did carry principles in my bosom that I was ashamed of, but I am growing prouder of Freethought every day, and fully intend to assist in keeping the ball rolling. I am not able to do much, but what little I can I will do with pleasure.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50. Wife and myself think a great deal of the paper, and you may put us down for life subscribers. I am ever so glad to be able to add at least one subscriber to your list, and shall try to obtain more. As soon as possible I will add one dollar to your Campaign Fund. We hav your first TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and prize it highly, and think that the next one ought to contain a correct history of the Puritan devilment and persecutions toward Quakers and alleged witches. Was in hopes that Messrs. Putnam and Watts would lecture somewhere within fifty or one hundred miles of this place, so that we might go and hear them, and still hope so, although the last TRUTH SEEKER says they leave Chicago for Kansas City, thus leaving us out in the cold.

Yours for truth, W. T. LEINS.

CORTLAND, O., Nov. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. Although my term of subscription is not out, and at the same time I am a laboring man, working by the month, I find no difficulty in raising the required amount, and hope I never shall. I dearly love THE TRUTH SEEKER, as it is open to free discussion, and givs all sides a hearing, none excepted. I could say a great deal more for the good old paper, and of the knowledge I hav gianed by perusing its pages, but I will let it speak for itself. Some time ago I received some pamphlets of you, namely, "False Claims," "Crimes of Preachers," and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, also some others. I hav scattered them throughout my neighborhood. I come across them quite frequently, but hardly ever in the same place. So I know they must be doing good service, by the threadbare appearance they hav; and when they wear out I mean to supply their places with new ones. Although my neighbors love to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, I can't get them to subscribe for it. They say it is hard times, and they hav no money. The country around here is full of people who call themselvs Liberals, but they are just peeping through the shell. All we want is a Charles Watts, Putnam, Remsburg, or a J. L. York to wake them up. It is only a matter of time when we can hav a good lecture by some of the above-named. Organize! That is what I am working for; that is our only hope, as a class of Freethinkers and co-workers, for the liberty of mankind.

I mean that you will hear from me again soon.

J. D. WHEELER.

ENFIELD, MASS., Nov. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I received Kelso's book, and hav read it half through. Though I hav been reading Infidel books for the last fifty years, I think this last one of Kelso's is enough to convince anyone that they had better let the church alone, unless they contrive some way to kill its influence on the people. I hav been doing that for the last fifty years or more. My father was an orthodox minister, a nativ of Springfield, Mass. My mother was eighteen years old when I was born, illegitimate at that, and she died when I was six days old. He, no doubt her murderer, went to central Connecticut, and there made converts until forty years old, and died. Since then I hav lived there, and got acquainted with many of the people that he converted. They said they thought him a saint. I told them he was a rascal, and I made Infidels of quite a number of those he converted. "Honor thy father," says the Bible. I detest the thoughts of the lecherous old scoundrel. Hav not I a cause for hating the clergy?

In one of my songs I say:

"I think had I known the fond cares of a mother,
Her counsel would screen me from many a blow
That oft I'm receiving from one and another,
As onward through life's rugged journey I go."

I once had a book with the story of Dr. Faust making a league with the devil, etc.—or, as it was called in other books, Faustus:

Dr. Faust, 'tis said,
Though he's many years dead,
Made a firm league with old Satan,
That the devil his soul
Might take to his hole,
If ten years old Faust he would wait on.

The devil agreed
All that Faustus should need
He would bring him at ten minutes' warning.
"If money," quoth he,
"I will bring it to thee,
Ten bushels or more every morning."

Dr. Faustus then said,
With a shake of the head,
"Mr. Devil, I think that's too low.
A few bushels more
You must bring to my door,
Or to some other devil I'll go."

So it is with the clergy; they'll take all they can
From the credulous dupes, and the laboring man.
They must bully the church, the women, and schools,
Or else they will go where there's bigger damned fools.

WM. P. ROGERS.

FRESNO, CAL., Oct. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hope you will publish C. B. Reynolds's lecture in pamphlet form. I refer to the one published on page 626 of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the current year.

I hav received Col. Kelso's "Bible Analyzed." I hav been reading the Bible for more than fifty years, most of the time to find weapons with which to fight the believers in endless torture; but "The Bible Analyzed" is the book of books for that purpose. It furnishes the Liberal with answers to the Christians and with questions for them. It makes the Liberal the master of arguments. The book contains twenty chapters, and more than twenty columns of index, which render it easy to find any subject the reader desires. I hav learned many things that I did not know before. It is a ready reckoner. Let no Liberal that can get "The Bible Analyzed" be without it; and if one cannot afford it, let more club together and get it anyway. GEORGE PADDINGTON.

TORONTO, CAN., Nov. 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4—$3 of which is to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please apply the other dollar to the League Fund.

I am now seventy-seven years of age, and blind in one eye and can't see extra well out of the other; but as long as I can see I want THE TRUTH SEEKER. I trained the best years of my life with the "Hardshell Baptists." About ten years ago I read the "Age of Reason," and began to see daylight. I regret the many years wasted in superstition and darkness, and found that to doubt a divine revelation is the beginning of wisdom, as it opens up a grand field of study. I derive great pleasure and profit from reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. May you prosper far beyond your most sanguin expectations, and long continue to publish your excellent paper when the writer of this is dust and ashes.

SQUAW CREEK, IDAHO TERR., Oct. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $10, to be applied as directed. You will notice that I order four copies of "Crimes of Preachers." I am out of that work. I received a call from a preacher a few days since, and had none to giv him, but presented him with one of A. Jacobson's "Bible Investigators" instead.

What has happened to friend John Peck? I miss his sledge-hammer blows from THE TRUTH SEEKER. Formerly his say was the very first read when the paper came.

What the Robin Said.

I remember once a robin,
Whose breast was very red;
Close in a cage they kept him,
And this is what he said:

"Far in a distant greenwood,
My brother flies most free;
And yet he's very lonely
In flying without me.

"My cage is gaily painted,
And bright as it may be,
And yet I miss the sunlight
That dances on the lea.

"I cannot see the morning
Climb up behind the hill,
Nor the silver moon when shining
Through the tree-tops, calm and still.

"I am pining for the woodland,
For the plain aglow with flowers,
For the daisies and the grasses,
All bright with summer showers.

"O mistress dear, hav pity
On poor robin in his cage,
Please free me and I'll love you
Till my breast is white with age."

To a Wild Rose in October.

O dear little wild rose,
So fragil and light,
In the cold and the storm
Still blooming so bright,

Though above and around
Are death and decay,
Sweet perfume thou breatheest
Through life's little day.

So cheerily onward
May we also go,
Through storm and through sunshine,
And rough winds that blow.

E'er scenting with fragrance
Life's pages sober,
As sweet as the rose that Bloomed in October.

Our Summer Visit.

Madga and I are twins, and our home is in Chicago. There are five of us altogether, papa and mamma, brother Robbie—he is the baby—and Magda and I. Papa is a reporter for one of the papers here, and we are not very well off—that is, we don't hav much money, so we can't go away every summer, like some people. Sometimes papa takes Magda and I with him when he goes out of the city to write up something; but I must tell you now of our trip this summer. Our uncle Charley livs in a small town on the bank of the Mississippi river in the state of Wisconsin. He has a store there, and comes to Chicago two or three times a year to buy goods, and then we children hav fun.

Well, this year he came in July, and we were so glad to see him! When he had kissed us all and said "How d'ye do?" all around, we asked him how long he would stay.

"Well, I'm going to take a couple of young ladies home with me," said he, "and I will hav to wait till they are ready."

You may believe we opened our eyes at that, and wanted to know who they were, and if we knew them. Uncle Charley said we were a little acquainted, and their names were Magda and Minna Burnz.

We didn't say a word for about a minute, I guess, and then we both said, "O mamma, are we going? is it true?" And mamma laughed and said, Yes, we were to go, and she had known it all summer, but did not tell us because we would tease her so much about it. For once we were in a hurry for Uncle Charley to go home, and the three days seemed like a week to us. But we did start after awhile. We both cried a little when we said good-bye to mamma, but we were all right after we were on the cars. We were very tired when we got to the city of D., in Iowa, where we stopped one forenoon. In the afternoon we went on the cars to Goose River Station. I never saw such a wild place as that is, and I thought if we had to stay there I would rather go back home. The railroad track is along the foot of great steep hills you can't see the tops of, and on the other side are thick woods or swampy places. But we didn't hav to stay at Goose River; there was a kind of an open 'bus there, and we got into that and drove down into the woods. The road wound around among the trees for about a mile and a half, and then we came out suddenly right on the bank of the river.

"There, girls," said Uncle Charley, "is the 'Father of Waters.'"

"Is that the Mississippi?" said Magda. "Why, Lake Michigan is ever so much bigger."

"Oh, yes," said Uncle Charley, "but not nearly so long."

While we were talking, the driver had driven onto a queer-looking thing they called a ferry-boat, and unhitched the horses from the wagon and put them in little pens, one on each side of the boat, and when the driver told them to go they began to walk, and a kind of wheel with steps on it turned around under their feet, and that made the boat move.

We were so busy watching the horses that we didn't look at anything else till Uncle Charley said, "What do you think of that for a view, girls? Isn't that better than a lot of houses to look at?" We looked then, and I tell you it was just grand. We were in the middle of the river, and looking across we saw the grand rocky hills before us. There is a wide strip of land between the river and the hills, and the town Uncle Charley livs in is built on that. The ferry-boat landed near a saw-mill, and we rode right over a great heap of saw-dust. There were great piles of lumber and logs around the mill.

We had to ride nearly the whole length of the town to get to Uncle Charley's. Aunt Bell was looking for us, and wasn't she glad to see us though, and we were so glad to run around once more.

The next morning we went down to the river just after breakfast, and stayed till dinner time. It was so nice there.

We stayed at Uncle Charley's three weeks, and such fun as we had. The second night we were there, just after we had gone to bed, Aunt Bell came and told us to get up to see the electric light on a steamboat. It was just lovely. The boat was above the town, but the light shone on the hills below town, and we could see every tree and the rocks just as plain as in the day time. Nearly all the boats hav the electric light now. We soon learned to know what kind of boat was coming by the whistles. The different lines hav different whistles.

We had great fun going out rowing on the river. Uncle Charley had a boat and would take us out on the river every evening. Magda and I soon learned to row quite well.

We climbed the hills a great deal, too, and it was great fun to sit up on the hills and roll stones down. Our birthday was the twenty-first of July, and Uncle Charley took us in his boat to a large sand bar down the river, where we had a good time wading in the water and hunting carnelians on the beach.

One day, Uncle Charley told us to put on our oldest clothes, and told Aunt Bell to put up some dinner for us. When we were ready, he led the way to the river, and we got into the boat, and we went away up the river, past the saw mill and around some islands, then into a slough, till we came to a place where the water was too shallow for the boat to float. Then we got out and walked across a sand bar to another slough, and there we saw such a sight. The water was nearly covered with pond lilies; the broad green leaf right on the water with the snow-white lily in the center.

We took off our shoes and stockings and waded right in to pick them. We had all we could carry, and they just filled the boat. We ate our dinner in the boat and then went home.

We put our lilies in a small tub on the porch, and kept them a long time.

We were real sorry to go home, we had such a good time, but when mamma wrote how lonesome she was, we thought we would like to see her, so we went home sooner than we intended. We will never forget our visit, and will go again next summer, if we can, to see the "Father of Waters." MINNA AND MAGDA.

A Hard Way to Earn a Dollar.

"Your tongues will all wear out some day," said Uncle Dick.

The children laughed uneasily. Teeny felt of the tip of his to see if it was still in good running order.

"I don't believe that any more than anything. Do you, Molly?" he whispered.

"It's only just some of Uncle Dick's nonsense, I guess," said Molly, looking at hers in the glass. "Anyway, not till we are real old and then we can get false ones. They hav 'em now a days; there's false teeth, and false hair, and false noses, and false everything."

"Oh well, pooh then!" said Teeny, "I'm not going to try and save 'em any."

So they began talking again.

Teeny had a spool. It was chipped on one end. He called it an engin.

"See this engin," he said. "It's a winding-up engin. It'll go firs'-rate. Pop—bang! Away it goes! Don't you wish you had a winding-up engin?"

"What was the minister's text yesterday, Molly?" he asked.

"I don't fink," said Molly. "It isn't any matter; I didn't see any diffunce to it."

"Lamartine!" said Uncle Dick, sternly, (Teeny's name was Lamartine.)

"What?" said Teeny, meekly.

"Can you tell me anything whatever about the Sunday-school lesson yesterday?"

Teeny felt badly, but he couldn't tell a lie. "Not last Sunday's," he said honestly, "but I can tell you all about winding-up engins," he added joyfully.

"No, I thank you," said Uncle Dick. "I'll make a bargain with you. If you won't speak a word for an hour, I will giv you a dollar apiece."

"Oh, we will not!" cried the children.

"You spoke!" said Uncle Dick.

"Oh, we won't!" cried the children.

"Oh, you did!" said Uncle Dick. "Now you can begin again."

"We won't speak a word. Oh, dear, there we spoke again! Try us this once."

"Very well," said Uncle Dick.

So they went and got their slates. "Let's when we want to say anything just write it down," scribbled Molly. "They say we talk so awful much. I don't believe it will make a slateful."

They kept still and held their dear little babbling tongues for fifty-five minutes, then Teeny's pencil dropped.

"It's broken into three halves," cried Teeny.

"No matter," said Molly, kindly; "it will last all the longer."

"Well done!" laughed Uncle Dick. "You shall hav the dollar if you did speak. It was a pretty hard way to earn a dollar."

Salvation Army Note.

All the members of a family at Fishkill Landing hav become insane over the Salvation Army. The family was one of the most respected in the place. First one daughter was converted to the Army, and then the remainder followed. The parents kept a large boarding-house, but there was so much Salvation Army heard in the house that the boarders all left. Then one of the daughters said she had been inspired to marry the captain, but the latter did not know of it, and the ceremony did not come off.

[Of one thing we may be certain, that the dear little readers who compose our circle in the Children's Corner, will never be led astray by any such nonsense as emanates from the eccentric body known as the Salvation Army. Clear heads and cool brains characterize our little men and little women.—ED.]

Correspondence.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Permit me to thank you for publishing in your corner, "Jack—A Mendicant," which I inclosed you for THE TRUTH SEEKER family of children, some time since.

It is, I think, the most pathetic story I ever read, and cannot fail, I believe, to awaken in the minds of your thousands of youthful readers that horror and detestation of the awful crime of vivisection which I hav striven so diligently, during the past six months, through the other columns of the noble TRUTH SEEKER, to instil into the intelligences of the maturer readers of that paper.

But "Jack" is not alone suitable reading for the young, but most interesting, likewise, to "children of maturer growth."

I do not now recollect who is its author, but know that it was first published in Blackwood, and was copied from that publication by our society.

Is it not sad to reflect that this very day in Lyons, France, dog-catchers, employed by the vivisectors of that city, are capturing stray dogs in the streets, which these heartless scientists buy from them at one or two francs apiece (twenty to forty cents), and then torture them to death in their dreadful dens of cruelty? Yet such is the fact, and some poor "Jack"—some poor, lost mendicant—may be, even at this moment, seized by their ruthless hands!

Where is the God of love, of justice, and of mercy? Let him hide his face from his poor, wronged creatures, if he be not worse even than the vivisectors themselvs!

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

NEWBURG, Nov. 1, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I find in my puzzle in Children's Corner of Nov. 1st a misprint. I wish you would please correct in your next issue, if possible. It may be my fault in not writing plain, but if so whatever, please excuse me. By study, effort, and experience I hope some day to be equal to Messrs. Juergens and Baker, and last, but not least, Uncle James.

Inclosed I send you a clipping from the Newburgh Daily Register, which I thought might interest you. Yours respectfully,

ROB'T BERNHEIM.

Mistakes will sometimes occur in the best of newspapers, and with so many kinds of penmanship, and so much to do in a printing-office, the only wonder is that they do not happen oftener. However, we reprint the anagram this week, and hope this time it is correct.—ED.

[I hav before me the copy of Mr. Bernheim's anagram as originally written. If he had written that as legibly as the present copy, the mistake might not hav occurred. I would like to offer the suggestion that puzzlers, above all others whose manuscript goes into the printer's hands, should make their copy absolutely plain. Not only should puzzles be so written that they can be read; they should be so legible that they cannot by any possibility be misread. I hav often found it necessary, in the hurry and rush of getting out a newspaper, to spend some little time solving puzzles in order to be certain that they would be correctly printed. Many writers owe to the care of the compositor and proofreader more than half the credit received for whatever degree of clearness they attain. There are something more than 500,000 distinct and separate pieces of metal to be properly adjusted in each issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Who wonders, then, that one of these gets occasionally misplaced? While this warning is intended mainly for puzzle writers, it should not be entirely overlooked by other correspondents.—PROOFREADER.]

LECTURE.

IS MAN A FREE MORAL AGENT, OR IS HE A CREATURE OF CIRCUMSTANCES?

The following points will be thoroughly tested, which will form the substance of this lecture:

Can the emotion of man resist the power of Psychology?
Does God attend religious revivals?
Is there a God of battles?
Is it God or the physician that heals or kills the afflicted?
Why do men abuse themselves, knowing that it is to their own injury?
Why do Christians deny God as a healing medium in time of sickness, and confide in the skill of medicine only?

All desiring Lectures within the state of Illinois during the present fall and coming winter should address

Poetry.

The Cogitations of a Bachelor.

AT FIFTEEN.

The school is done, and the winter spell;
The schoolmarm and I, we drift apart,
And Romance I. lies cold and dead
On the new-made grave of a busted heart.
Go plant the willow and cypress-tree,
Hang up the hand-sled out of reach;
I will get the parson to measure me,
And take my size for a funeral speech.

AT EIGHTEEN.

Mustach and whiskers are sprouting now,
I'm taller than then by half a head;
But oh! for surcease of an aching brow,
And the glare of a city painted red.
For I'm out sometimes with the other boys,
And come in, like Solomon, "filled with dew;"
I awake the morn with a merry noise,
And the gentle murmur of my bazoo.

AT TWENTY-ONE.

I'm hardly the whale that I thought to be
In the first faint flush of my third decade;
The elderly matrons say "boy" to me;
My eternal fortune has not been made.
But I think on marriage and family,
(Measles and cradles and trundle-beds),
Hold other folks' youngsters upon my knee,
And damp little babies with tow-white heads.

AT TWENTY-EIGHT.*

I sneer at the follies of long-gone years,
At the callow youth and the sweet sixteen,
At the heartstrings torn, and the bitter tears,
At the hand unpressed and the blush unseen.
With the outstretched ear of a rareripe mind,
I list to the lovers that laugh or sigh;
I've a cynical smile of a freezing kind
For the tender grace of the days gone by.

G. E. M.

*These last eight lines are subject to repeal or material modification.

The Wife.

She clung to him with woman's love,
Like ivy to the oak;
While o'er his head with crushing force,
Earth's chilling tempest broke.

When the world looked cold on him,
And blight hung o'er his name,
She soothed his cares with woman's love,
And bade him rise again.

When care had furrowed o'er his face,
And clouded his young hours,
She wove among his crown of thorns
A wreath of love's own flowers.

And never did that wreath decay,
Or one bright flow'ret wither,
For woman's tears e'er nourished them,
That they might bloom forever.

'Tis ever thus with woman's love,
True till life's storms hav passed;
And like the vine around the tree,
It braves them till the last.

A Word for Kelso's Bible Analyzed.

On reaching my home from my last lecture trip, I was pleased to find Brother Kelso's last book on my table awaiting my perusal.

Being a radical man myself, of course I am in close sympathy with all such writers as speak right out the naked truth.

And you will readily understand that, after spending twenty-five years of the best part of my life in the Methodist church, and now fifty-four years of age, as I am every day reminded by the silver in my hair, my time is too short to waste in groping and digging over a mountain of words in search of an idea. For such is the character of many books—a mere rehash of that which was far better said in the original form of statement.

But I am glad in justice to say this is not the case with John R. Kelso's "Bible Analyzed," as the reader will discover on reading the book.

I must say that I am proud to claim a kinship in the world of thought with Brother Kelso, with whom I am personally acquainted, and for whom I entertain the warmest sympathy and highest regard.

I like radical men and women who, by the electric shocks of their utterances, stir and quicken the stagnant pulses of the world. Such a man is the author of the "Bible Analyzed." His logic, like that of Thomas Paine, is a dead shot. His sarcasm, like that of Voltaire, cuts to the bone, and yet, withal, there is a golden thread of humor running throughout the work which renders it, as a whole, highly entertaining, as well as instructiv to all in search of truth about the Bible.

Truth is the right relation of things, and I am quite sure that friend Kelso has excelled in this regard in his most critical analysis of this so-called divine book.

The "Bible Analyzed" is a book of eight hundred pages, clear paper, large type, and nicely bound—a very God-send to those whose eyesight is impaired by age.

There is in this book no empty display of far-fetched learning to bewilder the average reader; it is clear and truthful in statement, definit and conclusiv in logic, and bears upon every page the fragrance of ripe thought, intensified and illuminated by nativ wit and clear common sense.

Our friend Kelso is not a smooth-haired, weak-hearted, sickly writer, daubing with untempered mortar, straining his mental machinery in the endeavor to see how near to the mark he can come without hitting it, but he hits it every time, and hits hard, and yet his work is remarkably free from prejudice, ambiguity, and bitterness; and, like Paine, D'Holbach, and Ingersoll, leaves in the mind of the reader a sense of satisfaction free from all doubt.

I can only hope that Brother Kelso's "Bible Analyzed" may find its way into the homes and hands of Liberals everywhere, for it is indeed an eye-opener, containing food for the hungry, and light for the blind, and a thousand clubs with which to break the heads and hearts of sacred lies and time-honored superstitions, and like the lucid, radical works of D. M. Bennett and Wm. Denton, will liv and be cherished long after its brave and noble author has passed to a higher life.

DR. J. L. YORK.

Stray Scraps.

"The novels of Miss Evans, Mrs. Southworth, and Mrs. Holmes hav been banished from the Cleveland public library as being too trashy." There is room in that Library for Solomons Songs!

"An Ohio farmer went bustling into Widow Jenkin's house the other day, and without even saying good-morning, blurted out: 'I am a man of business. I am worth $10,000, and want you for a wife. I will giv you three minutes in which to answer.' 'I don't want ten seconds, old man!' she replied as she shook out the dish cloth. 'I am a woman of business, worth 46,000, and I wouldn't marry you if you were the last man on earth! I'll giv you a minute and a half to go.'" Good; but what a catamaran!

"Professor Christlieb, of Bonn, Germany, read a paper before the recent meeting of the Evangelical Alliance at Copenhagen which contained some very startling statements. According to the statistics of the last twenty years, he said, there has been a large falling off in attendance upon religious services throughout Europe. Paris has more Atheists to-day than ever before existed in any great city. In no Christian country, however, were things so bad as in Germany. In many districts of Berlin there was only one church to every 50,000 of the population. In New York there were 200 places of public worship; in Berlin, only 50. Besides this, out of the whole population of Berlin, namely one million, only 20,000, or 2 per cent, attend divine service. Hamburg was even worse, for out of a population of 400,000, public worship on Sundays was attended only by 5,000. The ordinary religious teaching of the country is quite dead, and Christianity resolved into mere education. Skeptical works are popular with the working classes, and in the middle and upper classes hundreds are led away by the influence of scientific discovery and invention. Dr. Christlieb further stated that there were 40,000 out of a population of 250,000 in the city of Edinburgh who did not go to any place of worship, 200,000 in Glasgow out of a population of 700,000, and nearly a million and a quarter in London out of a population of 4,000,000." Commenting on this the New York Independent says: "We do not propose to deny the truth of these statements. There is, unfortunately, too good reason to believe that they are, in the main, true." Brother and sister Liberals, is not this encouraging? ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass.

Idaho Pete.

"What yer doin' out in this country—prospectin'?" inquired Idaho Pete of a tall, saintly-looking book agent.

"Oh, no, sir; I am selling the 'Life of Christ.'"

"Life o' who?"

"Of Christ, my deah fellah."

"Yes, I've hearn the fellers up on the range speak o' him quite of'en when the cattle's givin' 'em considerable trouble. What country d' he drive in, anyhow?"

"Among the mountains and over the plains of the far East. The record of his noble deeds has been handed down from generation to generation."

"'S that so? Who'd he wurk fur? D'ye know the name ov anybody he wurked fur?"

"He worked for everybody. He was truly a great man."

"Waal, I should shout. He must a been a rustler. Must 'a understood the business purty well after wurkin' fur everybody. How long ergo was he on the turf, pardner?"

"More than eighteen hundred years ago."

"Look, here, stranger, yer ain't givin' me any stuff, be yer?"

"I know not your meaning, sir, but it is true that the man in question lived eighteen hundred years ago."

"Is this ther first book that's ever been writ about 'im?"

"No, sir, but this givs the most comprehensiv review of his life, work, and death."

"He died, did he?"

"Certainly, sir, a most terrible death."

"Did he go under with his boots on?"

"Nay, sir, naked."

"Waal, that's the durndest trick I even hearn tell on. I've seen a great many cowboys sent over ther divide, but I never seen any on 'em hav ther toggery stripped off fust. Did he leave enny children?"

"He was never joined in the sacred bonds of wedlock, but he left children who hav preserved and perpetuated his memory till the present day."

"That's a little tough, stranger. I'd 'a thought considerable more of him ef he'd waited till he'd got married before he'd had so many kids. I suppose that's what got him inter trouble, wasn't it?"

"No, sir, there were those who were jealous of him; envious of the work he did, and of his great power."

"Strong feller, hey?"

"He was mighty."

"Carson Sam, out on the Sweet Water range, is the strongest man nowadays that I knows ov. How much cud this ar feller lift?"

"His strength had no limit, sir. He could raise mountains."

"Buckin' steers, but he was a dandy! That's a good deal more'n Sam can lift. I shud think he'd been a bad 'un ter run up against."

"He was a terror to his enemies."

"Yass; how cum um ter get erway with him?"

"He gave himself up; surrendered, sir."

"What'd ther critter do that fur?"

"To save his fellow-man. He died that you and I might liv."

"Died fur me?"

"Yes, you."

"Crawlin' snakes! I didn't hear 'bout this afore. How'd he die? Did they shoot him?"

"No, hung him to a tree."

"Hung him!"

"Yes, and nailed his hands and feet to the tree and make wounds in his side, letting out his life's blood."

"Stampede my cows, stranger, ef I don't wish I'd been thar; I'd a plugged the whole pesky crowd so full o' lead they'd a sunk in ther perarie. I don't want no feller ter die fur me. Say, stranger, I can't read, but I'll take er couple dozen o' them er books ter help his family out, an' you just tell 'em that Idaho Pete'll creep er thousand miles ter help 'em out ef they ever git inter a tight fix. I wish I'd er knowd about this er feller before. I might er dun sumpthin' fur his folks.—St. Paul's Herald.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. 700 pages. Paper covers, 75 cents; cloth, $1.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity, between D. M. BENNETT and Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. BENNETT and CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

1857. SECOND GRAND ANNUAL 1885.

New Years Gift Presentation,

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE 28TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE

ROCHELLE JEWELRY STORE.

January* 1, 1885,

At 2 P. M., ROCHELLE, ILL.

Last year on New Year's day Wettstein presented to his patrons assembled in Armory Hall, a valuable collection of beautiful presents, comprising 10 Gold Watches and Gold Chains; half a dozen genuin Diamond Pins, Rings, and Eardrops; over a dozen fine Silver Watches, solid Gold Jewelry, elegant Silverware, Fancy Goods, etc., ranging in price from $1.00 to $100.00.

This I propose to do this year and to giv my Liberal friends abroad an opportunity to receive a nice present.

The aggregate of goods presented will not be less than $1,500, and probably $2,000, according to amount of goods sold.

To all my customers sending $1.00 or more for goods or work, I shall present, for each and every dollar, a certificate entitling the owner to one or more shares in these gifts.

This is the fairest and most liberal offer ever made by any merchant in America My stock is complete in everything pertaining to a first-class jewelry store; prices now averaging 25 per cent below those of largest cities; goods sent by mail or express to all parts of the world accompanied by one certificate for every dollar remitted, and cash refunded if not satisfactory, and returned same day received.

Prices on watches again reduced since last price list in this paper. The presents will be presented in a public hall of Rochelle, directly to my customers, or to a committee selected by them at that time, in one entire lot, and the mode of distribution will be optional with them.

Everybody pleased last year, and all must be pleased this year.

Circulars giving all particulars and describing style and value of each gift, mailed free on application. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but now is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

IT is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of truth and of peace and bring glad tidings of good things to those who hav been sitting in darkness, and upon whom the sun of truth has not thrown its brilliaut rays. All day long will I stretch forth my hands and raise my voice unto the sons and daughters of men, and seek to deliver unto them the gospel of truth which we hav found, and to tell them of the liberty and peace which dwell in the truth as it is in nature.—D. M. Bennett.

A PROFOUND change has taken place in the world of thought. The pews are trying to set themselvs somewhat above the pulpit. The layman discusses theology with the minister, and smiles. Christians excuse themselvs for belonging to the church, by denying a part of the creed. The idea is abroad that they who know the most of nature believe the least about theology. The sciences are regarded as Infidels, and facts as scoffers. Thousands of most excellent people avoid churches, and, with few exceptions, only those attend prayer-meetings who wish to be alone. The pulpit is losing because the people are growing.—R. G. Ingersoll.

YOU are familiar with a book of considerable value, Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. I happen to know the influences under which that dictionary was framed. The idea of the publisher and of the editor was to giv as much scholarship, and such results of modern criticism, as should be compatible with a very judicious conservatism. There was to be no objection to geology, but the universality of the deluge was to be strictly maintained. The editor committed the article, "Deluge," to a man of very considerable ability; but when the article came to him, he found that it was so excessivly heretical that he could not venture to put it in. There was not time for a second article under that head; and if you look at that Dictionary, you will find under the word "Deluge," a reference to "Flood." Before "Flood" came, a second article had been commissioned from a source that was believed to be safely conservativ; but when the article came in, it was found to be worse than the first. A third article was then commissioned and care was taken to secure its "safety." If you look for the word "Flood" in the dictionary, you will find a reference to "Noah." Under that name you will find an article written by a distinguished Professor of Cambridge, of which I remember that Bishop Coleman said to me at the time, "In a very guarded way, the writer concedes the whole thing." You will see by this under what trammels scientific thought has labored in this department of inquiry.—W. B. Carpenter (Christian Register).

NOT PAUL BUT JESUS.—I recognize more and more—what I believe will be generally admitted no x—that the articles of faith, the sententious dogmas, "the scheme of salvation," which hav usurped the name of Christianity, originated almost wholly with Paul; and that not only did they not form the substance of the teaching of Jesus, but that they are not to be found in, nor can obtain anything beyond, the most casual, apparent, and questionable countenance from his genuin and authentic words. And, finally, I remember and wish to recall to the reflection of my readers, that this Paul, who transformed the pure, grand religion of his crucified master, was distinguished by a character of intellect, sable, metaphysical, and cultured, and, therefore, singularly discrepant from that of Jesus; that, moreover, he never knew Jesus upon earth, had never come under his influence, or been sobered by his saintly spirit and his clear, practical conceptions; had never seen him in the flesh, nor heard his voice save in trance, in noon-day visions, and ecstatic desert communings.—Grey's Creed of Christendom.

WHOEVER has read the daily newspapers for the last fifteen years or so, knows that nearly all the murderers that hav been executed in this country hav been avowed believers in the Christian religion and died expecting pardon through the great bankrupt salvation scheme called "the Atonement." The letters and papers left by them, as well as their dying words, show that they lived, not with the Materialistic belief that cause and effect are invariably linked together and that it is impossible to escape the consequences of our acts, but under the influence of the demoralizing doctrin that the effects of a life of immorality and crime can be washed away by the blood of a crucified savior, and that, while a Humboldt, an Emerson, a Theodore Parker, a George Eliot, a Harriet Martineau, are likely to be "damned" for their unbelief, the red-handed murderer, if he "makes his peace with God," is sure to hav a crown of glory and to be forever with the Lord. —Underwood's Materialism and Crime.

SOME men giv more clear light and knowledge by bare, distinct stating of a question, than others by talking of it in gross whole hours together.—John Locke.

THE Brahmans assert that the world arose from an infinit spider, who spun this whole complicated mass from his bowels, and annihilates afterward the whole, or any part of it, by absorbing it again and resolving it into his own essence. Here is a species of cosmogony which appears to us ridiculous; because a spider is a little contemptible animal, whose operations we are never likely to take for a model of the whole universe. But still here is a new species of analogy, even in our globe. And were there a planet wholly inhabited by spiders (which is very possible), this inference would there appear as natural and irrefragable as that which, in our planet, ascribes the origin of all things to designed intelligence. Why an orderly system may not be spun from the belly as well as from the brain, it will be difficult to giv a satisfactory reason.—Hume's Dialogs Concerning Natural Religion.

THIS being my task till the end of the year, why should I curiously inquire what is to become of me next? "There is aye life for a living body," as my mother's proverb has it; also, as she reminded me, "if thou tine [lose] heart, thou tines a'."—Carlyle.

Odds and Ends.

A LITTLE girl, who, with her parents had succeeded in reaching home just before the rain came down said; "Well, we beat the Lord this time, didn't we, ma?"

AT a catechetical examination in Scotland a little girl was asked: "Why did the Israelites make a golden calf?" She answered: "They hadna as muckle siller as wad make a coo."

A BRIGHT little miss of three summers was seated beside of her father at the dinner table. She was full of mischief, and her father finally said to her: "Dotty, if you don't behave better I shall hav to spank you." The little one remained in deep thought for a few moments and then answered, with a saucy twinkle in her eyes: "Oo, tant, pa; I's sittin' on it."

THERE was a donation party at Parson Bledsoe's house last Thursday evening. About ten o'clock Colonel Bumgardner met Elder Britt coming from the rear of the house, and said: "Why, Elder, where hav you been to?" "Oh, just taking a little siesta on the back porch." "Great gosh, show me how to get one, will you? I'm as dry as hot ashes!" The elder stood dumbfounded and Bum still believes the old Christian was too selfish to let him into the soft snap.

WHEN a man milks a cow, he should not attempt to smoke a cigar at the same time. A young man out in the country tried it, and got along well enough until he lowered his head and touched the cow's flank with the lighted end of his weed. The next moment himself and the cigar were dreadfully "put out." The cow introduced about two tons weight into one of her hind legs, and then passed it under the milker's jaw. When he ceased whirling around, and the myriads of stars he saw had disappeared, he said farming was the hardest work a man could put his hand to.

THE SUMMER GIRL.

There are damsels pretty and damsels plain,
There are countless vanities under the sun;
There's the girl who flirts on the railroad train,
And the female who giggles just for fun—
And she who at spiders and mice will run—
There are maidens of lofty and low degree,
But I turn aside from them all but one—
For the summer girl is the girl for me.

There are maidens somber of massiv brain
Who would faint if one dared to make a pun;
There are lasses modest and sirens vain,
And chattering dames who are worse than a dun.
There's the girl with a voice like a signal gun,
And who thanks the Lord that she yet is free;
But rather than these mai ds giv me none—
For the summer girl is the girl for me.

There's a miss who comes of a royal strain,
And sighs to conquer Sir Bobby's son;
And she who shows a poetic vein,
And vainly waits to be wooed and won;
And last of all, there's the silent nun.
But with none of them can I well agree;
In fact, these damsels do I shun—
For the summer girl is the girl for me.

L'ENVOI.

Prince, 'though perchance no good I've done,
At least accept my advice and be Peaceful and happy—in love with none—
—Yale Courant.

A BAD SPELL.

You hav heard of the City of Sioux—
The loveliest ever you knioux—
And the following tale,
I am sure cannot fail
To be read with emotion by yioux.

To this bustling city of Sioux,
Came a scion of Albion trioux;
When the name was pronounced
In his hearing he flounced,
And at once in a passion he flioux.

"Now tell me, O people of Sioux,"
He shouted, "What can a man dioux?
As 'tis spelled, so we say it,
And that is the way it

Should be!" And he blustered and blioux.
And all through the City of Sioux,
That man raised a hullaballioux.
With madness enraged,
Like tiger uncaged,
And fell upon gentile and Jioux.

As over the City of Sioux
He rushed, still the madder he grioux,
Till he fell in a fit,
And his soul promptly it
Left his body—sans further adioux.

Then the coroner's jury of Sioux
Their verdict most solemnly drioux,
"By disease of the heart
Victim's life did depart,"
You hav heard the sad tale; I am thrioux.

Notes and Clippings.

THE telephone has been introduced in New Zealand, Van Diemen's Land, Borneo, and Formosa. In Borneo the nativs call it the "hell talker."

ITALY has to keep 5,363 persons under sentence of penal servitude for life. Prison expenses are $2,000,000 a year more than those for education.

A FUND has been raised in England to assist any destitute families that hav been teetotalers for three years. Very few applications hav thus far been reported.

A BUCKEYE school teacher whipped one of his scholars severely, because the youngster said Chicago was in Ohio. The teacher said he did not feel so bad about the scholar's ignorance as he did about the libel in the statement.

THE mortality of the globe as given by a Continental journal which has made the computation is as follows: Per minute, 67; per diem, 97,790; and per annum, 35,639,835; whereas the births are 36,792,000 per annum, 100,000 per diem, and 70 per minute.

WHAT is the good of this Prohibition business, anyway? says Texas Siftings. Prof. Proctor says there will be no water on the face of this planet in fifteen million years, so that the Prohibitionists would hav to giv up their principles just about the time they were approaching success.

THE bigots of New Orleans are already moving to close the doors on Sunday of the Exhibition held there. As the people of the city hav won the right to hav the theaters open on Sunday nights it is not probable they will tolerate this puritanical interference with their instructiv pleasures.

PUBLIC opinion is rapidly coming round in support of cremation, says the British Medical Journal, and broad, religious sentiment is pronouncing in its favor. Among its supporters may be counted the Earl of Shaftesbury and more than one of the bishops. The London Sewer Commissioners advocate the practice.

LORD BRAMWELL heard a case recently in which the services of a heraldic expert were considered necessary and had been secured. In summing up, the judge referred to the herald as that "silly old man who did not understand his silly old trade." Some other wise man has defined heraldry as the "science of fools with long memories."

THE Duke of Hamilton's library sale is declared to be the greatest book sale on record. It continued over about forty days, and realized a total of $850,000. The Sunderland collection brought only a little more than one-fourth as much, and the Gosford only $45,000. The American demand for rare books in London is constantly increasing.

THE new minister was requested by one of the deacons to preach a sermon explaining certain needs of the church, and to ask for generous contributions. "Certainly," he said. "Will a week from Sunday do?" "Yes," said the deacon. "Very well; I will make an announcement to that effect at the close of the morning service next Sunday." "Oh, don't do that," protested the deacon. "Why not?" "Well, you don't know this congregation as well as I do; and if you should make such an announcement I'm afraid there might not be much of a turnout. We'll just spring it on them."

THE Rev. J. H. Hopkins, S. T. D., of Williamsport, Pa., and Mgr. Capel are engaged in a controversy on the question raised by the latter, "Whence Does the Protestant Episcopal Church Derive Its Authority?" Dr. Hopkins has published a pamphlet replying to the question. The monsignor now claims that in this reply his own utterances hav been falsified, and demands the suppression of the publication for this reason. The learned doctor denies having misrepresented Mgr. Capel, and refuses to stop the sale of his pamphlet. It is probable that the controversy will be kept up by the publication of a pamphlet by the distinguished emissary from the Vatican.

HEREAFTER Chili will aid Protestant as well as Catholic churches, the Chamber of Deputies having approved by a vote of 45 to 30 the measure for freedom of worship. But though the government has given the people freedom to worship it has not guaranteed their equally inalienable right not to worship. Chili would be a cold place for an outspoken Freethinker.

THE Presbyterians and the Prohibitionists, says the Winsted Press, are birds of a feather. All Prohibitionists are not blue skins, but so far as we know all blue skins are Prohibitionists. The Ohio synod of the Presbyterian church has just adopted the report of the standing committee on observance of the "Sabbath" and temperance, in which the following resolution occurs: "That the increased desecration of the Sabbath calls for prayer and for united and vigorous effort on the part of all good and law-abiding citizens to secure a faithful observance of that sacred day, the great end to be attained being the sacredness of the Sabbath and the entire prohibition of intoxicating liquors as beverages."

THE Kansas Supreme Court has just decided that a husband is not liable for slanderous words spoken by his wife when he is not present. By the common law the husband would be liable. The reason given for this is that by the old common law husband and wife were one in law, and the husband was that one. He controled her property, was entitled to her earnings, and even had the legal "right of restraining her by domestic chastisment." In short, the wife was the husband's slave. As he was allowed to administer "moderate correction," so he was deemed accountable for her misbehavior and held liable for her torts. The barbarity of the common law has been removed by legislation. In many states a married woman is empowered by statute to acquire and convey property, make contracts, transact business, keep her earnings, sue and be sued. She is no longer a legal nonentity. The right of the husband to administer "domestic chastisment" is no more recognized or tolerated by law than by civilized public sentiment. The reason for the common law rule making the husband liable for personal wrongs done by the wife has disappeared, and with it has gone the rule itself. "The wife," says the Kansas Supreme Court, "stands upon an equality in this state in all respects with the husband. She is alone responsible for her contracts, and should be alone responsible for her acts. Her brain and hands and tongue are her own, and she should alone be responsible for slanders uttered by herself."

WRITING to his humorous paper, Texas Siftings, Alex. Sweet devotes a paragraph to the Catholic church and politics. "Theoretically," he says, "the church never meddles with politics; practically, it has done nothing else except meddle with politics ever since it was a church, and very frequently the church has been on the right side, as, for instance, when the English bishops took sides against King John in the Magna Charta business. As a general thing the church does not openly espouse the cause of either candidate, but helps David Davis to keep the fence down. It is with the influence of the church as it is with the buggy rides of a certain gay and festiv drummer. He had charged buggy-rides in his expense account. The boss kicked vociferously. The drummer's name was not vociferously, however. The boss said he hired the drummer to sell goods, not to take buggy-rides. He told the drummer, moreover, that in his next expense account there had to be a total absence of buggy-rides. The drummer gracefully yielded the point, winking at the boss as he did so. When he sent in his next expense account the boss looked all over it, and said with a beaming smile: 'That expense account is all O. K. I don't see any buggy rides in it. That's the kind of an expense account the country needs.' The drummer laughed like a maniac, and said to the boss, 'You don't see any buggy-rides in that expense account, but they are there all the same, old man.' Just so it is with the influence of the Catholic church in politics. Uncle Sam don't see any politics in the account, but they are there all the same.'

ANECDOTES of the Rev. Dr. Isaac Watts, the hymn-writer, were related by Dr. King to the Eighteenth Street Methodist church of this city last Sunday. "Watts fell in love," said Dr. King, "and proposed marriage to a young woman. She replied that she loved the jewel but could not admire the casket. He secluded himself and wrote the following lines:

"'How vain are all things here below,
How false, and yet how fair;
Each pleasure hath its poison, too,
And every sweet a snare.'

Driven back by his disappointment in love to his contemplations of heaven, Watts next wrote the hymn beginning with the lines:

"'There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign.'

Much of the merit of the hymns Watts wrote was due to John Wesley's corrections. The hymn beginning with the words, 'Before Jehovah's awful throne' was weak before Wesley amended it." Watts was scarcely five feet tall, and died a bachelor.

W. A. CROFFUT, in the World, indulges in some reminiscences in which our League ex-secretary figures along with Daniel Webster. Mr. Croffut's first meeting with Webster was in this way: "Some years since I was sitting in an office on the third floor of a brick building, a little, but not very much, below the center of this city, where the Western Union building now stands. I was studying the cranes and pot-hooks of phonography. It was the editorial room of C. Edwards Lester, publisher of the Northern pro-slavery paper, the Herald of the Union, but it was early morning, and Mr. Lester was not yet there. Presently I heard a heavy and uncertain step on the stairs, and a portly man came in, breathing hard, and sank into a chair. He wore a blue broadcloth coat with flat, shiny brass buttons in double rows, and a buff vest, and his face looked seamed and sallow. "Is Mr. Lester not here yet, my boy?" he slowly asked in a double-bass growl like that of "Secretary" Gillette when he says, "Do you know?" and I remember that his eyes were deeply sunken and haggard. I told him that Mr. Lester never came so early. He said he had stepped over from the Astor House, hoping to find him, and added: "Tell him Mr. Webster called;" and then he crept down the stairs which he had climbed so painfully. I sat bewildered with joy. I had seen Daniel Webster and had spoken to him—the eloquent hero of whose praises the country was full. For an hour I sat scribbling the name "Daniel Webster" in all the combinations of which phonography was capable. Two or three days later, Mr. Lester sent his secretary—who was also my teacher—T. C. Leland, over to the Astor House to interview the great expounder; and it must hav been one of the first of American interviews. There were probably not a dozen phonographic reporters in the country then. Now there are many thousands. Mr. Lester is still in the city; I met him yesterday in the crowd in front of the World building. He is robust and hearty—one of the most venerable of our litterateurs. Leland has long since ceased to report speeches, and is now making phonographers. I called on him Friday after one of his classes. He is growing gray, but is as activ and enthusiastic as ever. I asked him what he got out of Webster that morning so many years ago. "I called to interview him about the Omnibus bill, a chief feature of which was the Fugitiv Slave law," said Mr. Leland. "He walked up and down his room with his hands behind him, wearing the traditional blue coat, discussing the situation conversationally. I got the gist of it and left. I afterwards reported his great speech on the Goodyear-Day India rubber case at Trenton. What he said had weight, but it all appeared to hav been studied and arranged. There was little spontaneity. Webster was no such natural orator as Clay was, or Tom Marshall, or T. S. Prentiss. He spoke very slowly, and I could report him verbatim, and at the same time think about other things, look around the room, recognize and speak to friends, etc. The first reporting I ever did was at Cobourg, Canada, at an agricultural dinner. I got $2 for it; wouldn't think of doing it now for less than $50. I learned phonography of A. F. Boyle."

JUSTIN MCCARTHY, a member of the British House of Commons, predicts that within five years Ireland will hav home rule and a parliament of her own.

THE New York News intimates that the Prohibition candidate for the presidency, John P. St. John, could hav been bought up and sent out of the field altogether for $10,000.

WHILE the "All-seeing" eye was watching sparrows and counting hairs last Sunday, the Rev. George Sayers, an Episcopal minister 60 years old, of Jamaica, L. I., was run over by a wagon, and one of his legs was broken.

THE Singer Sewing Machine Company last Saturday discharged 600 of their employees at Elizabethport, N. J., and announced that 500 more would follow this week. The reason given is that Southern, Western, and European orders are slack.

THE decision in regard to the Rev. Dr. Newman, whose congregation deny that he is pastor of the Madison Avenue church, is reserved by the judge before whom the case was brought. Meanwhile the church is in a fair way to be bankrupted by debt.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL O'BRIEN, of this state, has rendered an opinion that when accumulated interest and principal exceed the sum of $3,000, it is within the scope of the statute prohibiting more than that sum to be received by any bank from a single depositor.

LAST Sunday the miners of Coal Island, Ireland, attacked the Protestant church at that place, and drove the inmates out, assaulted with clubs and stones every Protestant they could find, and held possession of the village for two hours. The miners are not very good Catholics, but they seem to know how to put the fundamental precepts of Catholicism into practice.

MR. BLAINE attributes his defeat to the Prohibitionists, the Independents, and the intemperate remarks of the Rev. Mr. Burchard about "rum, Romanism, and rebellion." Mr. Blaine has resumed work on his forthcoming book, "Twenty Years in Congress." The Louisville Courier-Journal says it is understood that Cleveland will make Mr. Burchard chaplain of the Tallapoosa.

NOT more than one hundred persons listened last Sunday morning to the clergyman who knocked out Blaine in the late canvass with his alliterativ, "rum, Romanism, and rebellion." Dr. Burchard took for his text the performance of Shammah, the son of Agee, the Hararite who, when the Philistines invaded his lentil patch, defended it, and managed, single handed, to knock spots out of the whole army. Unless it was in the text, there was no other reference to Dr. Burchard's feat except when he intimated that he had been slandered and misrepresented in the newspapers in a way to try a saint's patience.

The Supreme Being.

The Supreme Being! The supremest of subjects this, on which all other issues hinge, whether of thought or of life!

Impressed with the solemnity of the theme, I would endeavor—hoping not to dogmatize—to state concisely the conclusions to which, under the light of liberty, science, and humanity, large bands of thinkers have already come, and toward which very many others are rapidly advancing. Doubtless some of my utterances may sound severe, but they are only spoken because I feel that now, as nearly nineteen centuries ago, an age has dawned upon us whose new wine can no longer be held in the old bottles; an age wherein again kindness itself demands that the ax should be laid at the root of the tree.

No lesson of history seems plainer than this, that even as individuals die, so states perish and religions wane; and, as far as I can read aright the signs of the times, "biblical revision" and "theological readjustment" can only be construed as the harbingers of a scientific reconstruction, and of the replacement of the Kingdom of God by the Republic of Man.

This, then, according to the best of my observation, and as nearly as I can state it in a few words, is the general position taken by the brotherhood of the philosophy of science, to wit, that hitherto the ecclesiastical God, conceived of as a person, has been presented and upheld as the paramount sovereign of the past, but that his image has become an obstruction in the path of progress, and must ere long be displaced; and that instead thereof, Man—Humanity—is to be the sole director of this planet in the future.

A few considerations touching these two propositions will constitute the scope of my argument.

But let me temper the somewhat apparent harshness of my attitude. The grand charity that comes of the spirit of historical growth enables all evolutionists to soften their abrupt and seemingly censorious averments by the concession that as the child believes in fairies and in Santa Claus, so, during the childhood and even youthhood of the race, some faith in a God or gods has doubtless been essential; but experience has also shown that better has it always been for man as he has freed himself from superstition's leading-strings, and best must it therefore be when the anthropomorphic God, the last of the idols, has crumbled from his pedestal.

Let us first confine our attention to the negative side of our thesis, that is, to the going of the old conception of God. That the intellectual and moral chemistry of the nineteenth century is rapidly effecting the disintegration of that deity seems inevitable from the following among other reasons:

1. That, in the light of what is called natural theology, even casuistry is tiring of its vain attempt to place an all-good, all-wise, and all-powerful creator back of a suffering and sorrowing world; and that in the light of what is called revealed theology, the scriptural portraiture of God has become a libel upon reason and a blasphemy against morality. I say a libel and a blashemy in that this divine revelation, so-called, depicts a deity who attempted to form in Eden a perfect first-parent, but who performed his experiment so clumsily, and made his man so weak as to fall at the first temptation; that for such peccadillo this incompetent, vindictive, and insatiate Lord, intent upon a never-ending death-feast, condemned not only the erring Adam, but along with him consigned the innocent unborn of the entire human family to unspeakable tortures forevermore; and that—piling horror upon horrors—out of the myriads this heavenly executioner thus had doomed, a few only, capriciously elected by himself, might be redeemed through the ghastly immolation of his only son. If such a monster could be fancied as existing on the earth, no agonies born of the brain and inflicted by the hand of cruelty itself would be regarded as atonement sufficient for his crimes. Well may men begin to raise the question why, with such a God, a devil could be necessary.

2. That the ecclesiastical God, as the theologians themselves are obliged to affirm, to be God at all, must be infinite, absolute, irrelative, unconditioned and first cause. But reason with its trenchant tone is asserting with unmistaken emphasis that man, who is finite, cannot apprehend the infinite; that man, who is dependent, cannot seize upon the independent or absolute; that man, who is relative, cannot grasp the irrelative; that man, who is conditioned, cannot clutch the unconditioned, and that a self-existent, uncaused first cause is simply unthinkable. Such, on its merely negative or destructive side, is the position of the Agnostic, and in that beautiful poem, "The Light of Asia," it is admirably put thuswise by Edwin Arnold into the mouth of that father of Agnostics, Buddha himself:

> "OM, Amitaya, measure not with words
> The Immeasurable: nor sink the string of thought
> Into the Fathomless. Who asks doth err,
> Who answers, errs. Say nought!"

3. That the belief in a divine architect of the universe was indissolubly connected with the old cosmogony founded upon Genesis, which predicated a flat earth as the habitation for man, with a hell below it as the abode of Satan and his victims, and a heaven above it as the mansion of God and the blest, while the sun, moon, and stars were trundled aloft as lamps to light the darkness. But the displacement of this narrow astronomical conception by that of the rotundity of the earth and its revolution through the fields of space, has widened heaven into immensity, has sunk hell below the bottomless, and doomed the olden God—if still he can be fancied to exist—to a homeless wandering amid the piercing chill of the immeasurable vast.

4. That as the generality of a belief in the flat earth just described proved only to be a generality of error, so the universality of a belief in a god or gods turns out to be simply a universality of mistake. In other words, we have pushed behind the bravery and blazonry of ecclesiastical stage effect, and have laid our hands upon the ropes and pulleys that have moved the human mind to entertain its theologic fallacies. We have practically penetrated back to the origin, and traced down from thence the evolution of the god-idea. We find it came about as the crude effort of the savage intellect to frame some theory of the world and find some hope to rest upon. In his barbarous ignorance—phenomena to him being then inexplicable through their laws—he sought an explanation of them as under the ordering and control of exterior wills, these wills again being embodied in ghosts or spirits. Want of space prevents the citation of the proofs of these statements, but the doubting reader is referred to the writings of Spencer, Comte, Tyler, Lubbock, and others, wherein it will be found that this conclusion is based on the most extensive inductions derived from anthropological research into the past and present low conditions of religious culture. It is then but a truism to say that these wills, ghosts, or spirits which I have thus alluded to, being originally multitudinous, were idols in their first estate; that, under higher civilization, becoming condensed into the fewer polytheistic divinities, they remained idols still; and that finally having been focussed into the monotheistic deity of Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism, an idol just the same such deity must be.

5. That the reign of God has been a reign of misery. The pathway of his march is strewn with pestilence and famine, and is gory with the blood of war. Ex necessitate, the very logic of theology is carnage, meaning, as it does, an infallible revelation, and that the honor of the infallible revelator must be maintained at every hazard, even, if need be, at the point of the sword, as when Europe and Asia, each in defense of its one true god, fought out their tilt through many a red crusade.

6. That, taking history in its widest aspect, the rule of God has been co-incident with subjection in government and serfdom in industry. And this, too, is of its inmost logic, for God-rule is the very antithet of self-rule or republicanism. It is the ruling from the top down instead of from the bottom up. The supremacy of God in the heavens means the tyranny by divine investiture (of the pope), priest and king on earth as his vicegerents dominating over their spiritual and temporal subjects. It means by the same process the sanction given to the master to command the slave. In fact, the whole history of the theological règime is the record of the degradation of labor. Modern slavery itself rests upon and is authorized by the Bible. For these reasons it is, among many others, that our pulsing age is treading its triumphant onward way to the music of the funeral march of that great fetich of the mind, that Supreme Being of the past, called a personal God.

Perhaps the artist soon will rise whose glory it will be to paint the two sublimest pictures of all time, the one the banishment of the man-begotten God, the other the advent of Humanity. I have touched upon the subject of the first. I now would shadow forth an outline of the second. And pleasanter my task becomes as I turn from black negation to hope-born affirmation, from iconoclasm to construction. But before entering directly upon this portion of my argument I would preface it with a short parenthesis.

Each man's universe, be he sage or savage, is for him the universe that he believes in, and such universe becomes known to him, and only can be known to him, through his own sensation, intellection, and experience, be that experience conscious or unconscious, individual or inherited. But "growing thought makes growing revelation," and so it comes about that the record of race-growth, religious or otherwise, is the story of advance from the littleness of little worlds to the beckoning possibilities of larger and ever-enlarging worlds. And under the process of the unmaking of God in the form of a man (the deanthropomorphization of deity, as it is technically called), which has been working persistently on throughout the centuries, the final conclusion, outcome, and flower of theology seems to be this: that the personal anthropomorphic God of Christianity must fade away; merged into the infinite and impersonal all, within which as a plenum, a "grand milieu," floats our earth with Humanity upon it. That this transition, with all its enormous consequences, will be to many terror-stricken souls like the tearing asunder of heart and body, cannot be gainsaid; but it is equally undeniable that Mankind, in his long-lived continuity, has passed through many transformations similarly radical, and that through them all, the race, per aspera ad astra, has emerged to take its stand upon a higher, holier, and grander plane. And we who have tasted of the ripened fruit of the tree of life as we find it growing upon the banks of our widened stream of time, would no more return to worship at the olden shrines than a freed prisoner, gladdened by the blue of heaven and the green of earth, would court again the damp and darkness of his dungeon.

Returning now from this preliminary digression, I come directly to the second part of my theme, the purpose of which is to attempt a brief description of this new faith of Science and Humanity, the revelation of the Supreme Being of the Future.

Perhaps I can best begin my sketch by narrating a memorable experience. Some three or four years since, it was my privilege, in company with a thronging congregation, to sit within the "fretted vault" of Westminster Abbey, whose hoary walls, bedecked with heroes' tombs, breathed awe and reverence. The service, mostly chanted, seemed like the strains of an angel choir. The priest, the late liberal and revered Dean Stanley, rose. It was Trinity Sunday, and the sermon was upon the topic of the day. But how altered and enlarged—I speak alone from memory—was the interpretation! The old narrow dogmas were used as symbols only. God the father, no longer belittled to the likeness of a man, was presented as the infinite itself, unknowable, unthinkable; felt, not apprehended; the not I; the fathomless, boundless ocean, whence flow the power and persistent energy which permeates and impels all things. God the son, the God manifest in the flesh, had grown from the Christ of Palestine into the Christ of history, into the Collective Man, Humanity, in whose providence we live and move and have our being, without whose care we could not live at all, whose daily death and resurrection is continually atoning for, by continually modifying, sin and evil. God the Holy Ghost was described as the individual conscience, the resultant of the action and reaction of men upon each other as social beings. And finally God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost were seen as the three in one and one in three, under the harmonizing unity of nature, wherein, through correlation, all things appear but as parts of one stupenduous whole, linking all variety into universal oneness.

If I have rightly reported the reverend thinker, he was not so far apart from Professor Huxley, where that savan says in one of his lay sermons, "If the religion of the present differs from that of the past, it is because the theology of the present has become more scientific than that of the past; because it has not only renounced idols of wood and idols of stone, but begins to see the necessity of breaking in pieces the idols built up of books and traditions and fine-spun ecclesiastical cobwebs; and of cherishing the most noble and human of man's emotions by worship, 'for the most part of the silent sort,' at the altar of the unknown and the unknowable."

In common with this his scientific brother, the eyes of the large-souled clergyman whom I have been recalling were not far from seeing the new salvation, for he had evidently rewritten the articles of his faith in that enduring book wherein all scriptures are seen but as chapters in the one Bible of Man, and in whose pages all saviors, saints, and heroes shine out as time's redeemers. By following the large method of the distinguished prelate, perhaps it will be found, after all, that it may not be so difficult to construct an easy bridgeway from theology to science. And so, in pursuance of this conciliative course, we find, upon a wide investigation—as far, at any rate, as my information leads me—that the fundamental basis of every great race religion has been two-fold: first, the conception of some moving cause, generally denominated God, and second, the incarnation of this God in an ideal man, who becomes the moral hero, the model and the savior of his race. This belief, I repeat, is the open gateway from the Religion of Theology to the Religion of Science. For if science casts its deadly dart at the anthropomorphic deity; if it mercilessly tells us that with the fall of the biblical cosmogony the mistaken salvation based upon it also falls, it still, with Goethe, chants its song of hope, by proclaiming that the heavens still arch above us, that the earth lies firm beneath our feet, that the eternal stars rise over us kindly glancing, while the All presses unto us in head and heart, weaving itself in eternal mystery, visibly, invisibly around us."

These suggestive sentences, borrowed from Faust, especially the last of them, serve as a hint to the scientific substitute for deity. But what has science to offer in lieu of the incarnation? I answer, Humanity. It is narrated in one of the Hindoo legends that Vishnu underwent nine fleshly metamorphoses, each higher and holier than the one previous, till finally came the Buddha, who, as the revelator of a code of ethics pure and simple, bestowed the grandest dispensation of them all. So, in like manner—only enlarging the figure—I now make the claim that this human consciousness of ours, Liberalized and hallowed through the long travail and preparation of time; has finally brought us to the simple yet inspiring conception of our earth embosomed in the cosmos and inhabited by the only Supreme Being possible to us, the only incarnation, the Race, Humanity, to whom in its Continuity and Solidarity, that is, in its past, its present, and its future, all individuals are indissolubly united, and with whom their fates are irrevocably connected. "Entre nous et le monde il faut l'Humanité," said Auguste Comte. Between us and the world there is—and there is need of—Humanity.

The question will at once be raised: Is Humanity a being at all? The query must be met. For a strictly scientific verification I would refer the reader to Herbert Spencer's "Synthetic Philosophy," "Principles of Sociology," page 467. The chapter is headed, "Is Society an Organism?" and the interrogatory is overwhelmingly answered in the affirmative by the showing of this learned philosopher that, like individual beings, the social being grows, develops in structure and function, exhibits dependence between the whole organism and its different parts, and manifests other distinct phenomena of life. But that society is an organism or being is, to my mind, at least sufficiently demonstrated by common speech, which unconsciously defines any civil association of human individuals as a "body politic," and which speaks as naturally of the life of a nation as of the life of a person. And by the extension of this instinctive conception, Humanity, in a larger and fuller sense, may be said to possess its own peculiar existence, an existence in which all other organisms, individual or social, are included, and by which they must be regulated. Carlyle, in his pointed way, touched on this close human interconnection, when he said that an Indian squaw could not quarrel with her mate on the shores of a lake in Maine, without producing a rise in the price of furs in London.

Taking for granted that, for my present purpose, the existence of Humanity as the highest science-born providence has been sufficiently proven, I proceed toward the completion of my argument. In describing God as the supposed Supreme Being I have necessarily alluded, directly or indirectly, to the creed, ethics, temporal government, to the industrial and spiritual life, resultant from Him as the primary ruler and law-giver. Let us now in a few succinct paragraphs try Humanity by the same tests.

1. As to creed. Humanity, through the special sciences, has bequeathed to us her discoveries in every realm. Astronomy is her messenger to report to us our position and relations in space. Physics and Chemistry are her teachers to instruct us concerning matter in its masses and molecules. Biology is her evangelist to proclaim the origin and development of vital being, and Sociology her apostle to unfold before our eyes the evolution of associative life from its lowest beginnings in the family and tribe to its highest social, political, and religious organizations. Thus, however much knowledge may, in the future, grow "from more to more," it will forever be but a filling in, for it can do nothing further than to make completer our present acquaintance with the material cosmos on the one side, and with the world of organic life on the other. And so the new faith comes to have its creed; a creed which is classified science, giving us our intellectual latitude and longitude as far as observations have been taken; a creed which, while as reliable as all discovered truth can make it, need never be feared as a shackle to bind the soul, since it is flexible, relative, and growthful, ever extending its welcome to the new which is continually being plucked from the yet unknown.

"You did not mention God in your astronomy," said Napoleon to Laplace. "Sire, I had no need to," was the astronomer's reply. And so, throughout all the realms of investigation, supernatural explanations, whether they concern dead matter, social life, or moral responsibility, vanish at the approach of a natural spelling out of cause and effect.

2. As to Ethics. Herbert Spencer, almost at the beginning of his most important work, "The Data of Ethics," uses these impressive words, "Now that moral injunctions are losing the authority given by their supposed sacred origin, the secularization of morals is becoming imperative." "Few things," he adds, "can happen more disastrous that the decay and death of a regulative system no longer fit before another and fitter regulative system has grown up to replace it." In spite of the beautiful Christ-spirit embodied in the gospels, the heaven-and-hell-doctrine, with its other-world selfishness, necessarily stained and bedraggled the Christian standard of morals. Delivered from Supernaturalism, Morality becomes simply the Science and art of right living. Its field is the individual in his relation to other individuals, to family, to town, to state, to nation, and to race. It is an adjustment of rights and duties. Each one has his rights limited by the like rights of everyone else. We must maintain our rights to make ourselevs complete, and thus useful, individuals. Rights are essential for the sake of duties; and this leads us to the thought of Auguste Comte, that the highest right of man is the right to do his duty.

But what a stupendous incitement to self-devotion does not the new faith present! The ineffable martyrdom of the past is behind us, weighting us with the sense of our vast obligation; the present is around us with our immeasurable dependence upon it; the future is before us with our responsibility to it. So immense is this motive that John Stuart Mill called the new evangel the Religion of Duty. Under it, self-interest and altruism become convertible terms, because in the unavoidable relation of each ego to his fellows, the highest, most enlightened, self-interest drives him to benevolence, nay, even to self-sacrifice. The vast misery seen everywhere must lead the noble to a vast compassion, and this, more than any abstract philosophizing, will show that each can only find his truest good in the good of all.

3. As to government, the new faith speaks with no uncertain voice in favor of republicanism, the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World. That most all-embracing of the Christian doctrines of the fraternity of mankind, in the fatherhood of God, will yield before the demonstration of the brotherhood of men in the motherhood of our common mother, Earth. The war inspiration of deity will yield place to the peace inspiration of Humanity.

4. As to Industry. Through ages of struggle the acquisition by the people of civil and religious liberty prophesies the near approach of their obtainment of industrial liberty, and the Social Democracy, or the Co-operative Commonwealth, is looming up as the ideal government throughout a world destined to become the United States of the Earth, and to guarantee to all labor, whether of brawn or brain, the fruits of labor's toil. Co-operative methods, both public and private, both state and individual, in agriculture, manufactures, and distribution—competitive methods becoming thus supplanted—are destined to bring about this consummation so devoutly to be wished.

And, finally, as to the spiritual life. It is here we find the last stronghold of theology. Can the new religion meet the needs and yearnings of the soul of man?

That the common conception of the human soul, originating, as it did, in the old dream and ghost theory of the universe, must be relegated to the limbo of mythology, seems incontrovertible to most of those who under science are searchers after proofs, but wider and wider grows to be the conviction that the spiritual life exists in the spirit of man himself.

> The soul a reflector is,
> Casting the image of heaven and earth;
> No more a specter is,
> But the perfecter is,
> Pointing the path unto worthiest worth.
> The soul is a trinity,
> Intellect, will, and emotion in one;
> This man's affinity
> Is to divinity,
> This is the sainthood by manhood outdone.

The Bible itself, in its highest, abounds in texts of like import. It says, "The kingdom of heaven is within you," and that "out of the heart are the issues of life." The most spiritual-minded saint whom the new dispensation has yet sent forth is Ralph Waldo Emerson. He, following right in the line of all human perfectibility, says that "the light by which we see in this world comes out from the soul of the observer;" and, furthermore, he affirms: "We know that all spiritual being is in man." It is for this very reason, for this supreme need of a truly spiritual life, that I believe in the dethronement of the man-made conception of God, and in the protectorate or providence of Humanity, since all spiritual energy spent on any idol, be it created by the hand or by the mind, is so much abstracted from ourselves and from our fellows. And therefore it is I have often said that I am not a Christian because I wish to be a religious man.

At one with the eternal flow of things, resigned in reverent awe before the unknowable finalities of destiny, self-reliant in our mastery over nature, self-restful in the dignity of our own individuality, consciously allied to the power in the race that makes for righteousness and knowledge, daily doing duty as duty comes, be it to handle a tiller or guide a state, triumphant in the hope of evolving womanhood and manhood, stimulated by the certainty that our spirit may march on to a glorious immortality of influence, we become "greater than kings, than gods more great," and attain unto the full measure of the stature of the spiritual man.

A poet, called by his brother Briton, Lord Coleridge, the greatest of living Englishmen, our country's late guest, Mr. Matthew Arnold, provides these words with which to draw my paper to a close:

> "Hath man no second life? Pitch this one high!
> Sits there no judge in heaven our sin to see?
> More strictly, then, the inward judge obey!
> Was Christ a man like us? Ah, let us try
> If we, then, too, can be such men as he!"

I conclude, then, by saying that no man can serve two masters. There cannot be two supreme beings. Which shall we obey, the anthropomorphic God, with ignorance, war, and slavery, or Humanity, with knowledge, peace, and freedom?

COURTLANDT PALMER.

United States Credit or Greenback Currency.

In the Radical Review, Mr. Albert Chavannes has objected to "free banking," under which head he confounds the disorderly speculations of divers corporations in the United States previous to Congressional intervention, with the People's Bank and Labor Exchange Bank, of which Proudhon and N. B. Greene hav treated. Again, Oct. 18th, he continues as follows: "Is it foreign to the subject of free banking to speculate on the freedom of the human will? Suppose the subject under discussion had been some form of conduct, the offshoot of authoritativ morality, instead of free banking, the offshoot of Anarchism, would it hav been foreign to the subject for me to hav shown to my opponent that authoritativ morality is based upon the infallibility of the Bible, and that before discussing the results he had better make sure of the solidity of his foundation?

"I know that most persons believe—Mr. Tucker certainly does—that if the people only 'willed' it they could establish Anarchy to-morrow, just as Christians believe that if the people only 'willed' it, they could all believe in Christ and be saved. But I believe no such thing. Men can no more believe in Anarchism at will than they can believe in Christ at will, and the realization of Anarchism at present is no more possible than the conversion of the world to Christianity. Now, if Anarchism is not possible because man cannot 'will' himself into the requisit knowledge and character, free banking, the child of Anarchism, is not possible either. So that to me, at least, the connection between free banking and free-will is clear, and one is as much a fallacy as the other."

Mr. Chavannes is perfectly well aware that the earnest soldiers of liberty to whom he refers are conscious of the difficulties and delays incident to a profound and radical change in public opinion on the subject of government, and the substitution of free contract for the ballot or majority representation. He knows that we anticipate no sudden revolutions and need no metaphysical commentaries on the human will. To turn the tables on him, we need only remark that who wills the end wills the means; that the financial policy he advocates depends on the consistent will of Congress; and that to show its feasibility involves the defense of Uncle Sam's moral character. Uncle Sam is not an individual but a collectiv power; to use more exact language, then, we will say, to vindicate the moral tendencies to honest and faithful administration of the public interests, since that crisis of 1862, when the banks, through the Senate, defeated Thaddeus Stevens's measure of United States treasury credits as currency receivable in payments of taxes, thus allowing the banks to depreciate the national credit notes in compulsory exchange for the specie of which they held the monopoly. I assume that the "greenback" currency advocated by Mr. Chavannes is identical with that of the government credit notes, since 1862, subordinated to the bank issues.

If we were doomed forever to the arbitrary sway of Congress and president, to fictitious majorities and a corrupt ballot, with caucus power behind the throne, a political lottery controled by millionaires, then state sovereignty, personal liberty, and the initiativ of local autonomies being all alike frustrated, the national credit currency system might be admitted as, theoretically, a lesser evil than that of bank privilege; but experience proves that the former (Mr. Chavannes's favorit policy) has never been able to prevail against the latter; that Congress is but the tool of financial monopolists who shaved the treasury notes paid out to soldiers, and by crippling the credit of the nation, more than doubled its war debt.*

What are the signs that the financial monopoly has lost, or is losing, control over Congress? Does Mr. Chavannes find them in the "national banks" or in the untaxed United States bonds, the basis of their currency,† or in the railroad land grants, or in the protectiv tariff? Now the tendencies evinced by these acts, all along the line, compose the moral character of Uncle Sam—a truckling tool in the hands of the money power. It is at least consistent in the champion of government credit money to lick the dust at the feet of the bondholders, as he has done in his letter of August 23d, and my reply to which he considers as a "personal attack." EDGEWORTH.

†We find in Hussard's Circular, a European organ of the financial power in 1862, the following: "Slavery is likely to be abolished by the war power, and this, I and my European friends favor, for slavery is but the owning of labor, and carries with it to care for the laborer, while the European plan, led in by England, is capital controls labor by controling wages. This can be done by controling the money. The great debt that (capitalists will see to it) is made out of this war must be used as the means to control the volume of money. To accomplish this, they (the bonds) must be used as the banking basis. It will not do to allow the 'greenback,' as it is called, to circulate as money any length of time, for we cannot control them; but we can control the bonds, and through them the bank issue."

The Liberal Club.

Since the veracious reports of the proceedings of the Manhattan Liberal Club hav been temporarily omitted from these columns, there has been a rising demand that they should be resumed. The heading of these articles has been preserved in type on the "standing galley" in the composing-room, and a dispute is liable to arise between the compositors and the stone hand as to who shall distribute it. To fill a long-felt want, therefore, and to keep the white flag of peace waving, the reporter feels it his duty to proceed with his weekly reports. They come high, but attention must be paid to the demands of the people, regardless of expense.

There were unusual attractions at the meeting of the club held on Friday evening, the 14th, and a goodly audience was present. The snug hall, the handsome chairs, over which the bright lights shone on sedate old men with gray hair, thoughtful and attentiv youths, and handsome women and girls figged out in gay attire, all combined to make a brave display.

At 8 o'clock Mr. Wakeman thumped on the desk with his little mallet, and called the assemblage to order. The senior secretary read a record of the last meeting. The chairman had a long list of announcements to make. There was a language class forming, which all were invited to join and learn French, German, and even English. Mr. Heywood's Labor Reform Convention would hold a session shortly, the date and place of which were given. Mr. Wakeman said that a series of protracted meetings were inaugurated, to begin that evening with Mr. Reynolds's address. Sunday evening following there would be another session, when Mr. Watts, Mr. Putnam, and Mr. Wakeman himself would speak. Then, Thursday evening, there would be a reception for the old and new officers of the League. There would be, of course, addresses, music, and, if he might so speak, a dance. Whether or not any of the members of the club knew how to dance Mr. Wakeman was in nowise prepared to say. If not, then it was the first duty of the new officers to instruct them in that useful and ornamental accomplishment. Mr. Watts would teach them the first lesson Thursday night. Gentlemen desiring instruction could obtain it by paying fifty cents for a ticket; ladies, twenty-five cents. Mr. Wakeman's announcements were received with visible tokens of interest. His dignified pleasantries are by no means the least attractiv features of the Liberal Club meetings.

The chair next took upon itself the combined pleasure and honor of introducing Mr. Charles B. Reynolds, of Rochester, chairman of the executiv committee of the National Liberal League. Mr. Reynolds advanced to the desk and was received with hearty applause. He broke at once into his discourse, and kept his hearers listening attentivly, frequently breaking into laughter or applause, until his hour was up. His subject was, "National Liberal League Secularization Through Organization." The speaker traced out a line of action to be adopted by local Leagues in the way of organization in states and districts, and the methods which should be taken by the National League to make its work effectiv. He advocated educational and social means for drawing Liberals together—Sunday schools, science classes, music and dancing for the young. Here he paused and, approaching the chair, threw the president into considerable consternation by proposing also that card tables might be introduced for the benefit of those who did not dance or sing and who knew how to gage the uncertainties of eucher and old sledge. Mr. Reynolds closed with an appeal for right living on behalf of general human development, and with a touching reference to the revered memory of D. M. Bennett.

Mr. Palmer expressed himself as highly pleased with the address of Mr. Reynolds. At a meeting of the board of directors, the speaker had at first, from economical reasons, discouraged the employing of Mr. Reynolds as a League lecturer on the ground that the League could not take the risk of furnishing him an adequate salary. Mr. Reynolds had thereupon nobly offered to bear all the risk himself. After hearing him speak, Mr. Palmer declared there could be no risk. A man with his enthusiasm, backed by superior ability, could only go forward to success.

Mr. Watts, being present, was called for from all parts of the hall. In a few brief remarks, without taking the platform, he said that he thought it would be better if some one who disagreed with Mr. Reynolds should speak and point out the errors into which he had fallen.

Mr. Andrews thereupon gave Mr. Reynolds a short lesson in Individuality. In the National Liberal League every variety of opinion should be tolerated, and even encouraged. It would be the glory of the League, as it was of the Liberal Club, that no one was thought the less of on account of any opinion they might entertain on any subject whatsoever. It would be the crowning triumph of Freethought when people could quarrel divinely about their beliefs and still be warm friends personally.

Mr. Cohen arose to say that he was delighted at the prospect of a Liberal sociable and dance. He had already purchased a ticket for the coming event. Although, being a middle-aged man, he had not danced for fifteen years, he would be present that night and he should dance the hours away, and he intimated that joy would be unconfined save by the utmost limits of the universe. Mr. Cohen is a vigorous speaker, and if he dances with equal effect, the sociable is an assured success. The speaker then went on to say that, as far as rendering an account of his acts to any other being was concerned, he felt perfectly independent, but he wished at the end of his life to be able to render a satisfactory account to his own conscience. Therefore his voice, his influence, and his money, so far as they would go, should be devoted to the interests of Liberalism.

Dr. Atkinson said that the remarks of Professor Andrews had set his molecules to jumping. There was a time, he said, when he believed that it was impossible that a Freethinker could hav a conscience, and when to be a journeyman soul-saver he regarded as the highest position to which human ambition could aspire. Mr. Wakeman, however, had taught him that there was a religion higher than Presbyterianism, namely, the religion of Humanity, though he could never quite bring himself to become an Atheist.

Mrs. S. Myra Hall, proceeding upon a strange misapprehension of facts, objected to the executiv of the League because it did not include women. For each male officer, she maintained, there should be a corresponding female. Except that she felt that her poor services would be of no avail, she would offer them to the League.

The pressure here brought to bear upon Mr. Watts urging him to speak was so great that he could no longer resist it, and he made a brief but hearty response. To correct the mistake of Mrs. Hall he drew attention to the fact that one of the League's most valued vice-presidents was a lady, as was also the chairman of the Finance Committee.

Next Friday evening Professor Vaughn, of Virginia, will speak on the "Falsities of Freethought." Mr. Watts will be there to reply to him, and the probability is that Professor Vaughn will not emerge from the conflict weighing enough to make tracks in a light snow.

In conclusion, Mr. Reynolds had only to thank the audience for their kind attention, which he did in a neat and appropriate manner. Everybody said the meeting had been a success, but there was heartfelt regret at the absence of Mr. Shook.

Canadian Notes.

Since Mr. Watts left Toronto we hav had three lectures; the first, on "The Cause of the Rise of Christianity;" the second, on "The Doctrin of Perfectibility," and the third, on "The History of Christianity." Next Sunday the fourth will be on "The Decline of Orthodoxy." We hav taken the Albert Hall permanently. Our lectures are given there on every Sunday evening.

The Christian superstition is dying out. There are indications of this being so on every side. The Toronto Mail, which assumes the role of "defender of the faith," and of being the mouthpiece of the church, in a late issue admitted the fact of the fading away of the mumbo jumbo fathered upon Christ. The Toronto Mail says: "The energy of skepticism, the contempt for revealed truth, are as remarkable in Canada as in the United States. Things are bad enough in this country to alarm not merely the members of churches, but all Christians. Without God in the world applies with fitness and force to the civilization of this age. In this contest it is manifest that the church is over-matched. Her ministers were never more alert, her machinery never so powerful, her courage never higher. Pious laymen hav come to her aid with innumerable outside agencies unknown a century ago, and she and they are bending their united energies to withstand the onset of skepticism, and it must be confessed that the battle is going against them. Just now skepticism is beyond question in the ascendant. As the hard-driven British squares at Waterloo prayed for Blucher or night, so from every quarter of the beleaguered church comes a cry for help, or a prayer that the last day may soon dawn upon the unequal struggle. The great question of the present day is not matters pertaining to this or that particular sect, but whether it be possible to save the whole Christian church from destruction."

The Great Canadian Convention of Freethinkers, which is to meet in Albert Hall, Toronto, Dec. 13, 1884, excites great interest among all classes of the community. It will undertake the great task of organizing Secularists throughout the dominion of Canada into one body, and perhaps affiliate and combine into one whole with a similar national society in the United States.

A leading Toronto newspaper in to-day's issue says the foes of the Christian church to-day are incomparably more formidable than they hav ever been since pagan times, and the dangers of her position are increasing on every side and every hour. The North American Review in its last number says pretty much the same thing in other words. It says: "Nothing is longer certain for us but what we see or touch, so that the whole ideal world is become a dream. We look upon the doings of the Christians and their religion and their God with the spirit of irreverence in which the author of 'Innocents Abroad' beheld the shrines of religion in Europe and Asia."

A four days' debate between Charles Watts and Dr. Sexton is being arranged for some time in February in the city of Toronto. Those who attend may feel quite sure that they will hav an enjoyable time.

Toronto, Nov. 15, 1884. R. B. Butland.

Woman Suffrage in New York.

From the Evening Telegram.

Now that the presidential contest is finally settled and the returns are all in, other aspects of the late election may be appropriately considered. Among these one of the most striking is the signal success secured by the advocates of woman's enfranchisment. The Suffrage bill in the last legislature was debated several times with marked ability, its leading advocates being General James W. Husted on the Republican, and Major James Haggerty on the Democratic side. Its most consistent and bitter opponent was Mr. Frederick B. House, of this city. When the vote was finally taken on the bill it stood 57 yeas to 61 nays. It was not a party measure; the friends numbered 29 Republicans, 27 Democrats, and 1 Labor Reformer. So great was the strength of the reform evident in this respect that it seemed certain that a well directed canvass would suffice to change the minority into a majority.

During the summer an activ campaign has been made throughout the state. Nearly every county has been visited by some leading advocate, while letters and circulars hav roused to activity the friends of the measure in regions where no speeches were made. Mrs. Caroline Gilkey Rogers, of Troy, visited and spoke in Wayne, Cattaraugus, Orleans, and Montgomery, besides, of course, her own county of Rensselaer. Mrs. Mary Seymour Hewitt, of Albany, addressed good audiences in Livingston, Wyoming, Genesee, and Albany counties. I myself started on a tour in July, which continued until October, and extended through forty counties. My especial object was to visit the districts of the members of Assembly who voted against the bill. Everywhere I found deep interest in the question, and, with few exceptions, met crowded houses. Where it was possible, I held a meeting in the town where the opposing member of Assembly resided, and he did not like it. It was one thing to sit in a comfortable seat last winter in Albany and say "No" when the roll was called on the bill. It was quite another thing to hav a speech made in a man's own district just before the nominating convention was to meet, and hav a large audience heartily indorse the sentiment that no one ought to be sent to the Assemby who did not represent the women as well as the men of his district.

The results of the campaign hav exceeded our highest hopes. In the first place, General Husted and Major Haggerty are both re-elected, so that we again hav our strongest champions at the front. Mr. Frederick B. House is left at home. A mass meeting was held against him in Caledonia Hall, which stands in the heart of his district, the Ninth New York, and measures were also taken in his case, as in many others, to secure action against him in the nominating convention. In this city, of the fifteen men who voted against us, only four are re-elected, and two of these hav promised this year to vote with us. In Kings the entire delegation voted with us last winter with one exception, and he is left at home, while seven friends are returned. Without recapitulating the entire state, we find on the total returns this remarkable result: of the 61 who voted against us, only 15 are re-elected; while of the 57 friends, 30 will again be in their seats. Adding to these old advocates who come back this year, and former opponents who now promis to act with us, we hav thirty-eight votes certain to begin with. I may be pardoned a personal triumph when I add that of the men whose return I opposed in public speeches, only four go back, and of this number one has promised to vote with us. The judiciary committee reported unanimously against the bill, with the exception of the chairman, General Husted, and only one of these gentlemen will this year appear in the Assembly.

Some of the strongest men of both parties will be with us this session. Aside from the stanch champions already mentioned, we hav Olin, of Broome; Felter, of Rockland; Hogoboom, of Columbia; and Erwin, of St. Lawrence, who is already talked of for Speaker. With the opposition small and demoralized, and the friends of the movement strong and thoroughly organized, there seems every probability that we shall pass the bill this winter. In a friendly way, we advise all Assemblymen to vote for the reform, as it is political death to a man to oppose it. Whenever the women are aroused on this question they can defeat a man for re-nomination or re-election, and there would not be even fifteen men, who voted "No" last year, in the Assembly this season had there been the agitation in their districts there was in others.

NOTICE.

OFFICE OF NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
55 EAST 9TH ST., NEW YORK,
Nov. 17, 1884.

After this date, as I take the field and shall be constantly on the move, please make all checks, drafts, and post-office orders payable to Courtlandt Palmer, Treasurer.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, Secretary.

ALBANY AND TROY, NEW YORK.

Next Sunday, Nov. 23d, Messrs. Watts and Putnam will hold meetings, afternoon and evening, at Albany. A full delegation of the Liberals from Troy are expected. Let all in the vicinity that can possibly attend do so. Come to the gathering, drink in of the spirit of emulation and progress, and giv an impetus to the cause in your own neighborhood.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS, Ch. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

MEETING OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

The first regular meeting of the new board of directors of the National Liberal League was held at the office of the League, 55 E. 9th street, New York, on Thursday evening, November 13th, and was a source of much encouragement to all present. While every proposition was fully discussed, and each and all fully expressed their opinions, a spirit of harmony prevailed.

There were present, Charles Watts, Courtlandt Palmer, Mrs. Macdonald, Charles B. Reynolds, and S. P. Putnam.

On motion, in the absence of the president, Mr. Charles Watts was elected chairman of the meeting.

On motion Charles B. Reynolds was elected secretary to the board of directors.

The present headquarters, 55 E. 9th street, New York, was decided on as the office of the National Liberal League for the ensuing year.

Mrs. Macdonald, our efficient and energetic chairman of the finance committee, was engaged to take charge of the office, and perform the routine clerk work in the absence of the secretary.

The demands for lectures from all parts of the United States and Canada are so numerous that we found it impossible for Mr. Watts and myself to answer all the calls made upon us. Moreover, the directors saw the necessity of our revisiting places where Liberal seeds hav been sown, in order that care may be taken to promote their growth. Thus the great magnitude of the work demanded that we should secure some additional help, so that when an interest had been aroused in new fields, it should not be allowed to die out. It was therefore decided to engage at once one more lecturer, to devote the whole of his time to the work of the League, leaving it open to add to our staff of speakers as circumstances permit. The choice fell upon Mr. Charles B. Reynolds, chairman of the executiv committee, a gentleman thoroughly adapted for the work of propagandism in consequence of his long and varied experience as a Christian minister. Mr. Reynolds is a solid, practical man, and will, we are sure, prove himself of supreme importance in the pioneer work of our organization. The success of the League is now beyond doubt, and, with its trinity of official workers, all should rejoice at its bright prospects for the future.

THE NEWARK LEAGUE.

New York took possession of Newark last Sunday. In all the morning papers of that city it was announced that Charles Watts, S. P. Putnam, C. B. Reynolds, and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER would address the Newark Liberal League. The last name was appended as a little joke on the individual who never speaks in public, perpetrated by J. W. Frankel, who is a merry youth, a leader in the League, and a hard worker withal, besides being president of the Newark Press Club. When the above-named quartet, escorted by the jocose Joseph, arrived at the hall in Halsey street, they encountered Mr. E. W. Chamberlain, another New Yorker who had journeyed to Newark to hear Mr. Watts. Ascending the stairs in a body and passing into the ante-room, the question went round the audience, Are all those going to speak? The interrogators were assured that all but one were, upon which they collapsed back into their seats with great sighs of resignation. Mr. Watts was introduced by President Mayo in a very felicitous speech, and then spoke, as announced, upon "Religious Fanaticism and Secular Philosophy." The hall was crowded, and after the people had recovered from the shock of so much talent, it resounded frequently with hearty applause. Mr. Watts first pointed out the danger which religious fanaticism is to the welfare of society at large, and to individual liberty, and then showed the superiority of Secularism as a mental balance. The Inquisition, he said, and the Star Chamber had brutally murdered thousands. This huge crime could not be attriouted to the men who conducted these institutions, for doubtless a good proportion of them were as humane as any of their time, but must be credited to their religious fanaticism, which, feeding upon such cruel commands as dot the Bible, converted them into the human fiends which history records they were. The speaker drew a contrast between the taking of Jerusalem by the Christians, and its retaking by the Infidel Saladin. When the Crusaders captured the city in the year 1099, and Godfrey of Bouillon was made its king, the scenes of rapine, lust, and carnage were terrifying even to the onlooker at a distance of centuries. But when in 1187, Saladin regained possession, how different. No babes were dashed dead to the pavement; no wives outraged before their husband's eyes, no brothers murdered in the presence of their weeping sisters, no husbands slain that their families might be distracted with grief. On the contrary Saladin gave the Christians permission to depart in peace, and to those unable to help themselvs he gave money and aid. That was the difference between the acts of religious fanaticism and the acts of a man balanced in mind and unswayed by Christianity. Passing to the second part of his lecture he said that the philosophy of Secularism was that general utility is the basis of its ethical code; that human nature is the source of all moral obligation; that the more that nature is improved by experience and cultivation, the better and stronger will be the moral source; that those actions only are moral which are beneficial to mankind, and which add to the welfare of society at large; that the sanctions of morality are the protection of the individual, and the debt he or she owes to the community for its protectiv service; that the incentivs to moral conduct are personal excellence, and the general happiness and well-being of the community; and that the true authority of appeal is cultured reason aided by experience. Mr. Watts closed with an eloquent peroration, and sat down amid loud applause.

Mr. Putnam then took the floor. He sketched the work he and Mr. Watts, aided by Mr. Reynolds, had undertaken, and gave the figures of great encouragement which hav been published. New York city had contributed between five and six hundred dollars, Boston over three hundred, and he called upon Newark for at least a hundred. While the subscription paper was going round, Mr. Reynolds interested the audience by a short speech. He was followed by Mr. Chamberlain, at the conclusion of whose remarks it was announced that sixty-six dollars had been subscribed. This was afterward raised to $71, with assurances that during the year the League would make it a hundred.

MR. WATTS IN NEW YORK.

In the evening of last Sunday, upon his return from Newark, Mr. Watts lectured at the Liberal Club Hall. The subject selected for him was "Agnosticism: Its Exposition and Defense." The hall was well filled. Mr. Wakeman presided, and in introducing the lecturer made one of those fine speeches for which he is famous. He drew a graphic picture of the rise of Freethought, from Deism in the sixteenth century to Agnosticism in the nineteenth; from Lord Herbert down through Toland, Hume, Bolingbroke, D'Holbach, and Hobbes, to our own times of Martineau, Mill, Huxley, Bradlaugh, Darwin, and Watts. He paid a lovingly appreciativ tribute to Auguste Comte, whose memory he should always reverence for the grand ideas he had given the world. Mr. Wakeman said that the campaign now undertaken by Messrs. Watts and Putnam was a continuation of the revolution in ideas which began with Lord Herbert. It was a constructiv movement, a building up as well as tearing down, a substitution of a sound philosophy for an effete theology. The time had come for that, he thought, and he knew no better men than the present officers of the League. They had the enthusiasm, the ability, and the learning, and he hoped the people of New York and of the country would giv them aid and comfort.

It would be impossible to summarize Mr. Watts's address which followed. It was devoted to logically demonstrating the impregnability of the Agnostic position as against dogmatic Atheism, which affirms that only one existence is possible, and the Theistic postulate of the existence and presence of an Absolute Supreme Being. Practically Agnosticism amounts to Atheism, but as it is logically impossible to reason about that of which we know nothing, and logically incorrect for finite beings to deny or affirm the existence of an incomprehensible infinit being, he assumed the name of Agnostic. To illustrate a point he told a story of Charles Southwell, the last of the great dogmatic Atheists. He, Mr. Watts, had the fortune to liv with Southwell for a time. One evening Mr. Southwell announced that he had a new idea, which was to write a pamphlet on "the impossibility of Atheism." "But you are an Atheist," said Mr. Watts. "Yes, and that's the reason why I shall write the book," retorted Southwell. The pamphlet was published, added the speaker, and the proposition Mr. Southwell put out was that "as God did not exist, it was logically impossible to deny his existence." The audience saw the point, and made their perception manifest by hearty applause, which other equally good hits throughout the discourse made it necessary to repeat. Though the lecture is one for trained students and philosophers rather than for the general public, the thorough appreciation of its cold and clear conclusions from indisputable premises goes far to show that Mr. Andrews's claim that the Liberal Club is the greatest educational institution in the city is not unfounded. On this his first appearance in this city since his election to the vice-presidency of the League, Mr. Watts demonstrated his fitness as an intellectual leader in Freethought, and also his great ability as a logician. It is a pity that the leading theologians will not accept his challenges to debate, for on any field they may make the issue we are confident that he could vanquish them, and bring the justice and right of our movement before a still larger number of people than now. Mr. Watts will attend the sociable on Thursday evening, the Liberal Club on Friday evening, and go to Albany to deliver two lectures on Sunday.

WATTS AT STAMFORD.

Stamford is a quiet, puritanical town of good old-fashioned Connecticut, the summer residence of our famous ex-president, T. B. Wakeman, who is one of the best farmers in the country, and knows how to draw from nature's breast that vitality which makes him one of the sturdiest reformers of the day. There is a noble company of Liberals in Stamford and Sound Beach, but the vast generality of the people are encrusted over with orthodox respectability, whatever there may be within them of some glimpses of truth and beauty. Mr. Watts gave the first Liberal lecture ever delivered in this place. His subject was a very astounding one, namely, "The Devil: What is He, Where is He, And What Does He Do?" No doubt it came like a nightmare upon the stream of hitherto unruffled orthodoxy, for we know that for some time past the devil has lain quietly immured in the heart of orthodoxy, so much concealed by the flowers of rhetoric that very few are aware of his presence. So when it was announced that Mr. Watts would speak concerning his Satanic Majesty, there was a very general shiver down the orthodox back, and they refused to see the philosophical dissection of this "skeleton in the closet." Nevertheless. Mr. Watts did it very nicely, and I don't think that any intelligent orthodox mind would revolt at Mr. Watts's scholarly description of this "other" and sometimes "better half" of God, for if there were no devil there would be no God in the theological sense of that word. The whole system of Christian salvation would fall to the ground if, some fine morning, Lucifer should happen to disappear; the real devil that we hav to fight, as Mr. Watts showed, is not this shadow of the skies, but the devil of ignorance, and poverty, and crime, and this devil we will destroy, and humanity shall be made beautiful and happy. This is the heaven that we desire, this is the heaven that we will achieve.

Mr. Watts's lecture was so well received that arrangements were at once made for another to be given on Friday evening, Nov. 28th, subject, "Christianity and Secularism."

The Liberal League of Stamford and Sound Beach is preparing for a good winter's work. They are of the right stuff and will compel victory. Much credit is due Mr. George H. Bladworth, secretary of the League, for his untiring exertions in behalf of the work of the League. S. P. P.

THE CHICAGO LEAGUE.

MR. EDITOR: The evening of Nov. 5th closed the last half year of our existence as a local League. An election of officers was held; the officers are now E. A. Stevens, president; Wm. Furey, Mr. Brennamen, Chas. Fraenkel, Mrs. A. M. Freeman, and Mrs. L. M. Swank, vice-presidents; A. H. Simpson, recording secretary; A. M. Freeman, financial secretary; and T. Galpin, treasurer. Since the last election, we hav had twenty-six meetings on consecutiv Sunday evenings, with a general good attendance, and no lack of interest. During the summer months the audiences were somewhat thinned, but, considering the warm weather, were very good and there was no suggestion of closing. We hav had able and interesting lectures from Gen. Trumbull, Mr. Thomas Hill, Mr. E. A. Stevens, Mr. Francis Hinkley, Mrs. A. M. Freeman, Mr. August Spies, Dr. Arthur Merton, Judge Holbrook, Mr. A. H. Simpson, Mr. C. H. Kidder, Mrs. L. M. Swank, Rev. J. O. M. Hewitt, Mr. Sidney Thomas, Judge Russell, Mr. Wm. Furey, Mrs. H. C. Garner, James K. Magie, Professor Van Buren Denslow, and Mrs. Odelia Blynn, M.D. The subjects hav been on radical, industrial, scientific, and social questions, and hav usually been thoroughly and intelligently discussed.

We hav not been able to do much outside work, such as spreading Freethought literature, influencing legislativ or municapal acts, yet we know that the impressions made by earnest effort can never be fully estimated. Though we can not count our converts, or see exactly what we hav done, we know that as an educator we hav some power. Our mere existence helps to create public opinion, checks encroachment of orthodox laws, and helps the people to think for themselvs.

We closed the term with a successful and pleasant entertainment and sociable, and it was agreed to hold a series of them during the winter. Financially we are not very strong, but hope to get along better this winter, and do our duty toward the National League. I remain yours fraternally,

LIZZIE M. SWANK, Ex-Rec. Sec.

LEAGUE NO. 203. MILTON, UTAH.

Henry H. Nichols writes: "We hav got a charter from the state as an incorporated company, under the name of 'The Religio-Scientific Society.' We hav about fifty members. They are about equally divided between Spiritualists and Materialists, yet harmony prevails. We raised $200 for a library, and hav a good one. Three hundred dollars was signed to build a hall, but we hav not yet accomplished that. Our election of officers is semi-annual—first Sunday in January and July. Our present officers are: President, Stephen W. Harrington; vice-president, Miss Lillian Ballou; secretary, Henry H. Nichols. We are trying to get a speaker to come to this county to stay with us. I am writing to different towns to find what amount we can raise to pay a speaker for a year. I hav reason to believe we can raise a good Liberal sum.

THE MILWAUKEE LEAGUE.

Sunday evening, Nov. 9th, the Liberal League elected officers for the ensuing year as follows: President, P. A. Stuart; vice-president, W. A. McCaslin; secretary, E. W Ellis; treasurer, Mrs. Mary A. Blatz. After the regular business of the League, there was a general discussion upon the result of the presidential election.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS OF OGDEN LEAGUE, UTAH, NO. 95. HELD OCT. 27, 1884.

President, G. A. Parks; vice-president, Mrs. J. E. Brown; secretary and treasurer, John. A. Jost.

A new and commodious hall is being built for the use of this League.

O. RICHARDSON, Bronson, Florida: I am with you, and will ere long send a small contribution to the Liberal fund.

GEO. JEPSON, Smithfield, L. I., New York: We hav fifty-one members; fifty take activ interest. We hav a League library and free use of good hall.

A. H. THURSTON, Burr Oak, Mich., League, No. 167: We hav sent from here a small contribution for the Campaign Fund, all we feel able to do at this time. You are engaged in a good cause, and I am anxious to do all I can for its success. We all unite in wishing you success."

GEO. THORN, Sec. Clearfield League, Penn.: We hav not had a meeting of the League for some two years. I hav been talking with our members about the matter. We hav concluded to make an effort, keep up our organization, and help support the National Liberal League in their work. I hav collected a little money for the National Liberal League, and will do all I can to send more.

H. L. BOYES, Seward, Neb.: Ship ahoy! On the 5th and 6th Ex-Rev. Copeland, of Omaha, a very able man, givs us two lectures on scientific subjects. On the 9th prox. Professor W. F. Jamieson commences a course of lectures in this place. Won't that be a grand treat! During these lectures we will re-organize our League. We hav the material for a first-rate League, and if once properly organized we will hold the fort.

L. DE WITT GRISWOLD, Auburn, New York: By re-readlng your appeal to-day, so brimful of inspiration, I am actuated with renewed enthusiasm, and do believe that a mighty and wonderful work could be accomplished if only the Liberally-inclined could be aroused from their slumbers. Let us all unite and go to work as never before. Everybody can do something if only he or she would say, "I will."

I hav given freely both labor and money to carry on this work, but nevertheless herewith I inclose $2 more for the League fund.

The Pennsylvania State League will hold its annual convention at Altoona, January 30th, the day following the Paine Celebration. Messrs. Watts, Putnam, and Reynolds are announced to attend with other able speakers. Altoona is centrally located, being almost in the geographical center of the state, thereby enabling those who wish to celebrate Paine's birthday at home to reach that city in time for the afternoon meeting of state convention. Again, Altoona is easy of access, being situated on the Pennsylvania Central railroad, the main thoroughfare in the state. The city also contains a young and vigorous League that will do all in its power to make the state convention a success.

Communications.

An Explanation from the Hon. A. B. Bradford.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Since Man has been merged into The Truth Seeker, I feel it due to myself to ask the use of your columns to make an explanation which would hav been more appropriate in the columns of that paper had it survived the era of revival and good fellowship inaugurated at Cassadaga.

It is admitted, and both Catholics and Protestants mourn over the fact, that there is a quiet, but widespread, departure among the intelligent classes in this country from the creeds of the church to an acceptance of the grand system of truths which modern science has revealed, as those truths bear upon the subject of what is called religion. To illustrate: In all the cities of the Union where Colonel Ingersoll lectures, thousands of people go to hear him whenever he appears upon the platform. Here and there a predestinated "saint" will go to a lecture, pretty much as he would go to see Barnum's white elephant, because he has heard so much about it. But he will never go a second time. His mind is as impervious to new truth as a cork is to water, and he fears to expose himself to temptation again, lest God, in his wrath, "should send him strong delusions that he should believe a lie, that he might be damned." The human mind, however, in general, has such a natural and inherent love of truth that hundreds go, again and again, to hear Ingersoll make his terrible onslaught of logic and ridicule upon the religion in which they were educated. And such is the constitution of the intellect that if one who is intelligent and candid hears Ingersoll once, he can never afterwards be the same person he was before. His faith is shaken to its very foundations, and doubt, which is the mother of all progress, places his feet upon the track of inquiry, whose only terminus is reason, instead of authority. In all these cities there are Liberal Leagues, but of the thousands who pay their dollar, over and over again, and stand two hours on their feet to hear Ingersoll lecture, not five per cent of the whole are ever seen at the Sunday meetings of such Leagues. Why? Because avowed Liberalism is not "respectable."

History shows that there never was a great truth pregnant with blessings to mankind that was not rejected with contempt when first offered to the world, because it was an innovation upon established notions, customs, and interests. When Morse discovered that electricity could be utilized in conveying intelligence along iron wires, and proposed that the post-office department of the government should defray the expense of testing it, by erecting poles for the purpose between Baltimore and Washington, Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, who was then postmaster-general, laughed as scornfully at Morse's idea as his illustrious predecessors on the banks of the Hudson did, in 1809, when Fulton proposed to propel a boat through the water by the invisible power called steam. It seems to be a fact, looking very much like a law of nature, that every truth and every cause which aims to promote the welfare of the human race must run the gantlet of ridicule and contempt from that large class of fools whose necessary function in the plan of the universe is the ignoble one of serving as a mere rubber on the wheels of progress.

Now Liberalism in religion is just passing through this period of contempt. It is not yet respectable. It is precisely where the antislavery cause was, between the years 1830 and 1855, as Elizur Wright and Parker Pillsbury well remember. Its advocates are considered wild and cranky. They are also poor, and are forced to hold their meetings where they can, and not where they would. As the silversmiths of Ephesus, who got their living by making shrines for the worship of Diana, stirred up a mob to put down Paul because "he turned away much people, saying, that there be no gods which are made with hands," so the clergy of our day, standing on the ground made during the last eighteen hundred years, and seeing that their craft is in danger to be set at naught by the revolutionary principles which are circulating everywhere, vilify the advocates of those principles, meaning thereby to scare away the common people from their lectures, and making them contented with the dry husks of the church's theology. This policy bids fair to hav its day against Liberalism, as it has had heretofore, whenever poor Humanity took a step in its career of progress.

Now, thinking that organized Liberalism, in this country, and in this fast age, had struggled long enough under the era of contempt, and seeing that the churches, ignorant of its real strength, were conspiring together to crush it out, not only by fostering a false public sentiment, but by legislation, it occurred to me that if such a man as Judge Holmes, of Missouri, and a number of others of like high standing, who had not taken sides in the quarrels of the League, would call a convention of Liberals to meet in some central city, in order to take into consideration the present situation of affairs, it might eventuate in a large and powerful organization that would command the respect and co-operation of every real Liberal in the country. The church, when, by the heat of her zeal, she hatches out a brood of what the seventeenth-century Christians called "the chickens of the Covernant," coops them to protect them from the hawks and other vermin, and feeds them with the "crumbs of the Covernant" to make them grow. Ingersoll, at one of his sittings, will hatch out a brood ten times as large as any revivalist, but the next morning he is off in the cars, and, like the fabled ostrich, leaves his progeny to shift for themselvs. The consequence is, the vultures of the church hover them. Organizations would secure these converts, furnish them with a home, and giv them society and something to do. If it be objected that this is the church method of cooping converts, I reply, fas est ab hoste doceri. In this organization of her numbers and her strength the church shows her consummate wisdom.

In view of this, I felt that the men composing the National Liberal League, seeing that it was a mere means to an end, would not object to hav their organization superseded, provided the grand objects specified in the Nine Demands, as settled, and forming the bond of Union, in 1876, could be more effectually carried out. I thought, in the earnestness of my faith and hope, that the contemplated new organization might be an evolution and differentiation from the Liberal League, just as the depised abolition party evolved into the Republican party in 1860, which gave us Lincoln, and saved the nation from the curse of slavery and disunion. The country is full of Liberals. I wanted to marshall them, and bring them into battle array. To this end I, last March, addressed a letter to Man, which was then the organ of the National League, sanguin in the hope that the realization of my plan was at least among the possibilities, if not the probabilities, of the near future. But, for some reason or other, neither the Investigator, nor The Truth Seeker, nor the Index, nor the Radical Review, nor any other paper, ever laid my letter before its readers. I then felt, under this smothering process, that any futher efforts in this line would be premature and abortiv; and that the "Liberals," technically so-called, must continue another ten years under the disciplin of misrepresentation and contempt before they were fit for the honor of evolving into an organization that would redeem this land from the bondage of superstition; and that the only organized instrumentality through which any Liberal work could be done at all was the National League, hamstrung as it was by the blunders which had been committed by its own members in past years.

Under these most unfavorable circumstances the League held its annual Congress at Cassadaga last September. I did faintly hope that, as the times did not seem ripe for a new and really national organization, the Boston wing of the Liberal League would have appreciated the generous conduct of Messrs. Wakeman and Leland in declining re-election to their respectiv offices, and in proposing a reorganization on the basis of 1876; and that, imitating the patriotic policy of the North and South in shaking hands over the bloody chasm of war, would hav come to Cassadaga. We did not want them to apologize to us for the past, neither did we think of apologizing to them. We proposed, since Comstockism had been practically squelched by the courts of law, and the sacredness of the mails maintained, that bygones should be bygones, and that a new set of officers should be chosen on the basis of the Nine Demands, and thus effect a re-union of our forces. But not one of our former brethren either appeared in person, or sent a kindly letter of excuse. The Congress was, therefore, forced to do the best it could in the circumstances. We elected new officers, made its pronunciamento, arranged the machinery for the work of organization and enlightenment during the coming year, and then adjourned.

The harmony of the meeting was undisturbed, till, by one of those blunders which Talleyrand pronounced worse than a crime, a motion was made to elect Mr. Underwood as one of the vice-presidents of the League, in face of the fact that Mr. Underwood had treated the League with seeming disrespect, and when anyone might see the impossibility, under the circumstances, of his acceptiag the honor it was proposed to thrust upon him. I hav sincere respect for Mr. Underwood's learning and abilities, and most highly appreciate his past services in the cause, and firmly believe that had he been present he would hav implored the mover to withdraw his motion. For no man knows better than he that, while some persons would hav been gratified by this mark of respect paid to him, very many more would hav been angered. But the motion was carried, and proved to be, as might hav been expected, a firebrand. Warned of the general effect which this move would hav caused abroad by the particular effect it immediately produced in the Congress, I proposed, at the next session, to extinguish the brand by a motion to cut off the whole list of vice-presidents except the first three. The motiv for this policy was transparent to all except the blind, and seems to hav been understood by Mr. T. W. Curtis, in his Index account of the proceedings. It was a plan to get rid of the unpleasant consequences of the former action of the Congress in a way that could not possibly giv offense to anyone, inasmuch as I, myself, was one of the vice-presidents to be decapitated. My motion was carried, and the Congress recognized the rule of the constitution that the number of the vice-presidents should be six.

Mr. Underwood, in the Index, seems to persist in demanding that the Congress should hav revoked its action taken at Syracuse on the postal laws, as a propitiatory sacrifice to him and the seceding party, and a sine qua non to their coming back. But he and they would hav to wait many miliions of years before the League would hav done this. The imminent danger in our national politics, growing out of the late civil war, is a tendency toward consolidation on the part of the general government, overriding the constitutional powers of the state governments, and showing itself, among other ways, in tampering with the sanctity of the mails. And there never was a braver act done in history than the act of the League, under the lead of Mr. Wakeman, in sticking to the true constitutional doctrin on this subject, when they knew that, as a consequence, cartloads of church filth would be dumped upon them by Comstock and his allies. If the mails are used for improper purposes, let the guilty parties be proceeded against and punished by the state courts, and not vest every petty postmaster with authority to exercise his feeble judgment as to the character of the printed matter that passes through his hands. For if he were a Radical, he might take it into his head that, on account of the coarse passages in the Bible, the Comstock law made it a penal offense to send the word of God through the mails. And the whole tribe of Miss Nancies and prudes in pantaloons might disallow the booksellers to use the mails for sending to their customers even the plays of Shakspere, or works on physiology, because, to use a hateful term, they were "obscene." Besides, there is no doubt that the Comstock law of 1873 was a stratagem of the church to harass and annoy, if not entirely suppress, the Liberal papers, especially The Truth Seeker, under the guise of preventing the spread of impure literature. I hav too much respect for the intelligence of our Boston brethren to suppose that they did not understand the subject in this light. But it was the only argument that could be used to justify their opposition to the League, and so they fell in with Comstock, and used it. But time, and the second sober thought of the legal mind, indorse the judgment and action of the Liberal League.

I hav now made, as briefly as I could, the explanation I felt I ought to make to my brother Liberals, and relying on your courtesy to giv it a place in your columns, remain

Respectfully yours, A. B. Bradford.

Enon Valley, Pa., Oct. 21, 1884.

Bugbears.

Some people who are fond of having pets keep bears. Mr. J. G. Malcolm has a pet belonging to the species known as bugbear. He has named his particular bear, "Landlordism." "The sword of landlordism" seems to be piercing his very vitals. In The Truth Seeker of Nov. 1st is an article headed, "Fleeing from Landlordism." It is not worth criticising, and I should pay no attention to it were it not for the fact that part of it is misleading and likely to do positiv injury to honest poor people, though I freely acquit the writer of that article from any design to deceive anybody. The Truth Seeker now goes to all parts of the Union, and statements calculated to influence the business interests of others should be carefully made. I hav no hope of dispelling the gloom that rests on chronic pessimists like Mr. Malcolm, but there are always people who are actually and earnestly seeking homes, and who hav no time to spend in vain dreams that can never be realized. For these I write.

Mr. Malcolm introduces us to a mythical Irishman who has fled from Ireland, and on reaching New York is thrown into despair by the startling information that vacant lots are not given away, together with a chromo, in the city of New York. Sadly he shakes the dust of that unrighteous city off his brogues, and proceeds to the metropolis of the West. There he sees more vacant lots lying as quietly as ever without even a ruffle on their brows. But they are all fenced with big swords, so he gets on the back of another flee and soon lights in Kansas. "The waving prairie-grass" is full of glittering swords, and he would be glad to return, no doubt, like Noah's dove, with even an olive leaf in his mouth. After all this fleeing he is told that white men are entirely out of the article he is looking for, viz., "The land of the free;" but certain "big Injuns" hav all there is. These latter must be monopolists. The Irish fugitiv then cries out, "Noble red man, let me make my home with thee." Did Mr. Malcolm ever happen to be present personally at one of those touching interviews between the man from Tipperary and the Choctaw brave? And did the n. r. m. grant the request? Just fancy that scene. An Irishman, fresh from the old sod, pleading for a home with a red savage, and saying "thee." It seems to me that I hav somewhere heard of that "noble red man" before. We will now know where to look for missing Irishmen.

Mr. Malcolm says, "It is a rule in political economy that whoever gets money without earning it, gets money which some other person or persons hav earned but did not get, and this is what is vulgarly called theft." Will the gentleman please giv us the name of the author of that quotation? But whether it was from Aristotle or any man since doesn't matter; it is utter nonsense. A man has a thousand dollars which he obtained honestly. His son wants to go into business, and the father givs the son one thousand dollars to help start the latter in business. The son didn't earn a cent of that money, but is he therefore a thief? Then this talk about compelling every man to "earn all he gets" is about as useful as so much talk about the probability of a money panic in Central Africa. Is there a man on this globe competent to tell for all the rest of the world exactly what every man or any man earns? It would be as easy to count the flakes of falling snow. Does the editor of a newspaper earn anything? If so, how much? Some editors get a great deal of money, but others, working just as hard, it is said, hav to skirmish at times among free-lunch counters. Which ones get the right amount of money? If none, who can tell exactly how much more the poorly-paid ones ought to get, and how much less the well-paid ones?

As Sir Thomas More (not Moore), the author of "Utopia," was born before Columbus set sail on his great voyage, and as he got his Utopian idea from Plato, his views in regard to the needs of Americans in the nineteenth century must hav been, to say the least, somewhat crude and undeveloped. Let the boys and girls continue to study algebra and other useful branches, instead of racking their brains over impossible problems, propounded by visionaries whose heads are filled with Utopian schemes. Mr. Malcolm says: "Even in the state of Michigan the young men are fleeing from the landlordism there to the Far West. In Michigan, out of 36,000 000 acres of land in the state, only 6,000 000 are improved, and but 2 000 000 acres are public land; the remaining 28,000,000 acres are held in idleness by landlords, who will continue to hold them until the starving people will yield up their wealth to them for the lands." Now, who in this wide world ever before heard of starving people yielding up their wealth to landlords or anybody else? Then he says: "Why is this thus?" I giv it up. Perhaps some of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers are good on riddles. Now landlordism, such as Mr. Malcolm speaks of, is wholly unknown in Michigan. If you should ask the average Michigan young man what he thinks about landlordism, and when he intends to flee, he would reply: "Landlordism! What's that?" There are now fully 7,000,000 acres of improved land in Michigan. The upper peninsula contains about 10,000,000 acres. That part of the state runs up to Lake Superior, and is a great mining and lumbering region. At this day there are in Michigan at least 6,000,000 acres of unoccupied land, an area larger than seven states like Rhode Island, open for settlement. Over 1,000,000 acres are government lands which may be pre-empted. The remainder can be bought at various prices, ranging from fifty cents to ten dollars per acre; the greater part at less than five dollars per acre.

Without being exact as to what are considered large and small sums of money, we may say that every young man is in one of three conditions, financially. He has a large amount of money, a small amount, or none. If he has a large amount of money he can buy highly-cultivated land in the best parts of Michigan; if he has a small amount he can buy where land is cheaper, and if he has none he can take up a homestead. This being the case, a young man who should leave Michigan and say that he had left because he could get no land, would be a liar of such Himalayan dimensions that he could confer no greater favor on the state than to take his departure. Michigan has the greatest copper and iron mines in the known world, employing thousands of men. It produces more lumber than any other state in the Union; this branch of industry employing more than 30,000 men at good wages. It produces more salt than any other state in the Union. Would Mr. Malcolm leave those rich mines and salt wells closed, and leave the timber standing on those pine lands, in order that there may be land enough for all?" The average size of Michigan farms is less than one hundred acres, and nearly all of them are cultivated by their owners.

The greater part of the lands held by lumber companies would be practically valueless to individuals if taken for settlement in their wild state, even if they were given away, because the cost of clearing and fitting them for easy cultivation is very great. Of course the railroads are among the grasping landlords. The lands granted to aid in building railroads were well-bestowed. These roads hav aided wonderfully in the development of the state, and contributed greatly to its material prosperity. Everybody knows that but few farms are entirely under tillage, even in the oldest states. As a rule, the roughest parts of farms upon which some timber usually grows which is reserved for fuel, etc., are not improved. These unimproved parts of farms, together with marshes, aggregating millions of acres in Michigan, Mr. Malcolm includes among the lands of his "devouring" landlords. It is true there are some wild lands—but only a small fraction of Mr. Malcolm's 28,000,000 acres—that were bought at government prices and are held by individuals, but the greater part of these can be bought at the low prices already named. As the population of Michigan considerably more than doubled between 1860 and 1880, and is now the ninth state in the Union in population, it is evident that most of the flees must hav been in ears that were itching to hear something mournful. Suppose there are twenty people who hav no land for every one who has, how can the rise of land injure twenty people for every one it helps, unless every person wants and needs land? If every man had land he must liv on it, or do just what the landlords are cursed for—prevent some one else from living on it, though it is unoccupied. The absurdity of the idea that every person needs land is too plain to need pointing out. If every man was a landholder, business would be in a very flourishing state, indeed. The question of how to prevent land from acquiring commercial value, Mr. Malcolm says, is "simple." True enough, and the solution easy—in is mind. If Mr. Malcolm would come out as an Anarchist, or a Communist, we could understand him better, but as it is, it is hard to tell where to place him. Notwithstanding what I hav said above, I am as strongly in favor as any one of giving every poor man who really wants land upon which to make a home, a chance to get it on the easiest terms possible. I am also opposed to the holding of land by speculators.

The Salamanca Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: All who attended the Salamanca Freethinkers' Convention pronounced it one of the best they ever attended. And I am resolved that the one to be held the first week in December shall be as good, if not superior. And I desire through THE TRUTH SEEKER to request all the Freethinkers of western New York and northwestern Pennsylvania to aid me in making the coming convention a great success.

There is no town of its size in the state that has the railroad facilities that Salamanca has. Some seven lines of railroad enter this town from various directions, and all will grant reduced rates of fare.

The same fine choir of singers that furnished the excellent music at the Cassadaga convention have been engaged for the Salamanca gathering. Good board can be obtained here for one dollar per day. A committee of our leading citizens have agreed to finely decorate the Opera House for the occasion.

The season tickets will be but fifty cents, and all of the speakers have agreed to take the proceeds, after paying the other expenses, so that there will be no collections taken up and no money called for.

I have invited Courtlandt Palmer, of your city, to attend and preside, and make an address, which I hope he will consent to do.

The convention will be opened on Thursday evening, December 4th, by an address from Charles Watts, and will continue through Friday, Saturday, and Sunday.

I hope to obtain the attendance of some able orthodox clergyman, to speak on Saturday evening, to be replied to by Mr. Watts on Sunday evening. A committee has been appointed to arrange for a social party on Saturday evening, after the lecture.

I hope to see the Truth Seeker Company represented here with a large quantity of Liberal literature for sale.

H. L. GREEN.

Sound Sense.

Judge Greene, of the Supreme Court of Washington territory, in a recent charge to the grand jury of Jefferson county, said: "Some say that you should hav the suffrage, but nothing to do with courts. But I say that to be a free man or free woman is to be the real king or queen of the state; that the franchise of freedom is threefold—legislativ, judicial, and executiv; and that he or she who has not in the judicial business of the commonwealth as ample and decisiv a voice as any, is not a free man or woman, but a subject, and more or less a serf. . . . In this country, what may be termed the judicial ballot on all principal questions of fact regarding crime, can be cast by a juror only. . . . What does it signify how wise your laws are, if the very same mind that animated you in legislating is not present in adjudicating? If a woman should hav any influence at the Capitol, she should hav the counterpart influence in the court-house. . . . She ought, and has a right, to meet and confer with other men and women, on a broad, sympathetic human basis, outside the cramping walls of sex and etiquet, and at some sacrifice of taste and habit."

"Why do I say all this? What relevancy has it to your grand jury duty? I speak because this is the fit time and place to warn you, and all your sex, and all interested in the cause of freedom who may hear, that there is a determined movement afoot to deprive you of your participation in public affairs, and because I want you to make a record—I will not say becoming your sex, for that you would do anyway—but signal and plain to see, like what your sisters who hav served on juries heretofore hav already made. If those forces in this territory which pander to drunkenness, gambling, and social infamy, those and other forms of vice that especially insult, molest, and desolate the home—if those forces, I say, aided and pushed on by interests from Portland, San Francisco, and St. Paul, invading our territory and intermeddling in our government, should succeed in our next legislature in dethroning and disgracing the women of Washington, I want every patriotic citizen to be able to point back to the record made by our women, not only at our polling places, but in our courts, as an ineffaceable monumental protest against the degradation. Degradation, I call it, for it is one thing to enfranchise and another to disenfranchise. To refuse to enfranchise those who are competent may be unmagnanimous, it may be heartless, it certainly is tyrannical. But to disenfranchise them when already free, is to impose upon them the most dishonoring penalty that can be visited upon a criminal suffered to liv."

This is a stronger defense of civil and political rights than is usually heard from the bench, and especially from a judge who is intensely Christian. In his case reason was stronger than revelation, and common sense stronger than the old ecclesiastical common law, which denied woman, not only the right to be a juror, but the right to be a witness, and which burnt at the stake all women sentenced to death.

The Presbyterians Re-enforced.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I send you, from the Presbyterian Home Missionary, a sample of the kind of pap on which the Presbyterians feed their people. After reading it no one would wonder at the dolorous complaints of the board of education that young men of ability avoid the ministry, and go into other vocations, when they would be expected to feed the Lord's poor sheep on such food. By the way, the Lord seems to be peculiar in his dispensations toward Presbyterian Home missionaries, in sending pious hens to lay eggs for them. A few years ago, the San Francisco Argonaut published a thrilling account, which almost produced a revival of religion in that city, given by another Presbyterian missionary at a Presbyterial meeting in the neighborhood, that to keep him from starving while he was preaching the everlasting "gospel" to the poor Yahoos, the Lord sent "a little brown hen" to lay an egg on his door-step every morning—except Sunday. On that holy day she declined to perform the labor of love, as it would hav been a sin in the hen. Pixley, the editor of the Argonaut, although a Presbyterian by birth and education, spitted both the "little brown hen" and the driveling missionary who told the tale. And yet we hav Liberals who think and say that the work of the iconoclast is done! They are almost as narrow in their views as the Presbyterian home missionaries aforesaid.

B.

PRESBYTERIAN HENS.—BY THE HON. JOHN ROSS.

I would love dearly to hav some of the members of the Woman's Executiv Committee to go over this grand mission field and see for themselvs. I can assure you that the need is great. If the Lord would place in my hand riches like Jay Gould's and others', I would certainly leave railroads alone and invest in establishing Presbyterian mission schools all over the Indian Territory.

Our Presbytery meets next week, and I am praying that the Lord will bless the session and that great good will come of it. I am a great believer in prayer. A few weeks ago Mrs. W. L. Miller wanted to hav a festival to raise means to repair the church in Tahlequah. She sent a young lady out to see my wife about helping. At first she did not know what to do, for we were getting but two or three eggs a day, not enough to make a cake of. I told my wife the Lord would certainly help her out. She seemed to be very much troubled about it. In the evening she got her corn ready to feed the chickens, and calling them all up around her, she told them the Presbyterians were going to giv a festival in Tahlequah, that she wanted them all to lay in the hen house, and not to lay outside, that she wanted to help all she could. The hens all walked around her and sang. We all laughed at her. The next evening she told our little ten-year-old daughter to go and see how many eggs she could gather. After a while she returned, exclaiming, "Why, mamma, the hens did mind you! Here are twenty eggs." So for ten days she got from nineteen to twenty-five eggs a day. The festival came off. My wife and fifteen-year-old daughter made twelve or fourteen cakes. It was a grand success. We made thirty-five dollars. The children hav Presbyterian hens. I am trying to teach them to do something for the Lord.

CHRISTIANS and their clergy are the genuin Infidels of the nineteenth century. They hav no faith in the religion which they preach. They are continually urging upon others to receive a doctrin which they don't believe in themselvs. They are Infidel to their own teachings. They are Infidel to the three gods, one goddess, and one book-god, of which their Pantheon consists. They are Infidel to everything that they profess, because they dare not debate the subject. They know too well that their so-called religion is a fraud and a sham, and like all other frauds and shams, it will not bear the light of investigation.—R. B. Butland.

Keep It Before the People.

The Central Presbyterian prints an italic article asking the Christians to keep it before the people that seventy-five millions of dollars are annually contributed in this country to sustain the churches; that during the present year one hundred and fifty millions of copies of the Bible hav been printed and distributed; that there are in foreign lands 5,765 missionary stations and 6,696 missionaries feeding out of the seventy-five millions; that these missionaries are assisted by 1,256 "other laborers;" that in India there are three millions of Christian pupils; that there are 1,058 missionaries and assistants in China; and, finally, that Christianity is neither dead nor dying.

We feel like helping the Central Presbyterian in keeping this before the people.

Keep it before them that seventy-five millions of dollars are wasted every year in supporting a hallowed lie; that for this enormous sum no value is returned; not a new fact is discovered, no unknown country explored, no oceans sounded, no heavens mapped, no colleges built, no information conveyed to the people, not even a hungry man fed—in short, absolutely no equivalent given for this vast amount. Yes, we will keep it before the people.

And we will keep it before them, too, that one hundred and fifty million copies of the Bible hav been spread broadcast over the world—a hundred and fifty million copies of erroneous records of barbaric doings, of insane ravings, of impossible performances, of a cheating humbug of a book that has deluded the people for century upon century, until they hav become weary of its eternal promis without fulfilment. What good has the distribution of these hundred and fifty millions of copies done? Better a thousand times that it had been a hundred and fifty thousand copies of school books; that the five thousand and odd missionary stations were institutions for instruction; that the nearly seven thousand missionaries were teachers of useful knowledge; that the three millions of pupils had been taught how to improve their condition instead of chattering a mess of rubbish that no living, or dead, mortal ever can or did comprehend; that the thousand missionaries in China had stayed among the heathen at home, and devoted their efforts to removing ignorance, instead of going to a country whose learning is greater, whose religion is kinder, and in which the people need instruction in civilization and not in a worse superstition than their own.

We trust that every paper in the country will keep it before the people that the prodigious efforts chronicled by the Central Presbyterian hav been utterly wasted, and that even if the world were converted to Christianity they would still be wasted. For the upholding of error must always be ultimately a waste of power. Christianity is a phase of religious thought that is passing away. It is not dead, but it is dying, the solemn asseveration of the Central Presbyterian to the contrary notwithstanding. Any intelligent person can see the disintegration now going on in the churches and in the faiths of the western world. Doubt is prevalent; it pervades every sect; men no longer believe in hell, and their hope of heaven is slight; the creation story, the fall of man, the atonement scheme, even the Christ idea, are all coming to be regarded as the notions of childish times. No intelligent man to-day believes in the Bible in its entirety. Science has driven Christianity from the field of serious philosophy. It is now more a social organization than a vital force among men. Palsy has stricken its heart; its pulse beats but feebly; it is dying by inches. Keep that fact before the people!

The Horrors of Christian Mormonism.

The recent attempt to bring to justice the polygamists of Salt Lake City has revived interest in the Mormons, and brought to light more of their peculiarly biblical beliefs and piously damnable practices. The prosecution of some of the polygamous members has set the church to defending this practice, and perjury is one of the most common of its shields. Another doctrin which it feels called upon now to defend is the blood atonement. This doctrin used to be openly advocated and secretly practiced, but it has been so furiously attacked that the church is now compelling its ablest advocates to perjure themselvs in the attempt to prove that it was never a practical part of Mormonism. That it has been taught they admit, and they defend it on biblical grounds; but they deny that it was ever practiced; yet the correspondent of the Sun givs a list of the number of victims to this doctrin. He does not vouch for the entire truth of them, which is very natural, for the crimes are of such a character that few indeed would be able to swear to their commission; but he givs the cases publicly and generally credited to the church:

"In addressing five hundred Mormon women in the old tabernacle one day, Brigham Young rebuked them for their murmurings and complainings, and said: 'Let me tell you if you should see some morning a dog running down the street with your husband's head in his mouth to keep your mouths shut.'

"James Monroe was 'blood-atoned' by Elder Howard Egan, with whose wife, a very beautiful woman, Monroe had been on familiar terms.

"A Dr. Vaughan was killed to atone for some sin committed by him, and two brothers named Aiken were slain in obedience to the orders of a council held in Neophi.

"A man whose name is not now recalled once, in passing the residence of Bishop Loveless of Provo, reached in at the window and took hold of the foot of one of the bishop's wives. He was put away by the avengers in order that his soul might be saved.

"A family named Parish came from the East as converts, and settled at Springville. Becoming disgusted with the worship, they renounced Mormonism, and told of their intention to return to their home in the states. Their case was placed in the hands of a committee, and it was decided that they must die in order to liv in the next world. They were inveigled into the meeting-house and killed, and when their bodies had been arrayed in endowment robes they were laid out side by side for the faithful to look at.

"Frank McLear got into some trouble with Brigham Young, and was put in jail. When he gained his liberty he sued the prophet for false imprisonment. This was considered a mortal sin, and Elder Hickman, one of the avenging angels of the Danites, put him to death.

"William H. Wilson, a newspaper correspondent living here, who wrote many articles for the Eastern press on Mormon practices, was induced on false pretenses to leave his bed and go down to the banks of the Jordan, where a grave had been dug for him. He was tried at the side of the open grave and acquitted. Mr. Landen, his associate, escaped and fled to Nevada, where he now livs, a cripple, owing to his terrible journey.

"Elder Yates was blood-atoned at Echo canyon by order of the church, because he traded with the United States troops at Fort Bridges. When Bishop Collister, in whose jurisdiction Yates was, asked Brigham Young what he should do with him, the covert answer was, 'A bishop can cut off any man in his jurisdiction.'

"When Godbe, Harrison, and Sherman abandoned the church, Brigham Young said, in the temple, 'They deserve to hav their blood spilled, but I don't tell you to spill it.' It is said that it was spilled, however.

"In a little settlement near here a saint named Adams, who had several wives, none of whom he could support decently, was remonstrated with by one of them against taking another. So determined was she that she threatened to abandon the church if he persisted in marrying again. Adams called a council of the priesthood to see what could be done about it. After a long consultation the bishop said: 'Brother Adams, can't you save your wife? If you havn't the heart to do it, just tell me, and I will appoint a committee to do it.' The brother begged for time to reflect, and the next morning the woman was laid out dead in her robes. No one asked the cause of her death, for everybody knew. After the council broke up he took her on his knee, talked kindly to her, and, while her head was on his shoulder and he was stroking her hair, he 'saved her' by cutting her throat."

This doctrin of murder was maintained on scriptural authority by Brigham Young, who is quoted as follows by one of the ablest of the Mormon defenders:

"I know when you hear my brethren talking about cutting people off from the earth that you consider it is a strong doctrin; but it is to save them, not to destroy them. There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon the altar, as in early days, and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, or of a calf, or of turtle doves cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of man. I could refer you to plenty of instances where men hav been righteously slain in order to atone for their sins. I hav seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would hav been a chance in the last resurrection if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled upon the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the devil. I hav known a great many men who hav left this church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled it would hav been better for then. The wickedness and ignorance of the nation forbid this principle being in full force, but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force."

In the speech in which this was quoted, the orator proved by the Bible, and by Christianity, that there was such a thing as blood atonement, and that "such a fate was the only hope of some kinds of sinners." But Brigham Young, he said, had particular reference to murder, adultery, and blasphemy, and he quoted the commands of the Old Testament that the murderer, adulterer, and blasphemer shall be surely put to death. He himself believed in blood atonements, but thought the time for carrying out the doctrin had not arrived. The present position of the church he asserted to be as follows: "We are not taught to resist our enemies. We are temple builders, and want to keep our hands clean. The people of this church hav a horror of bloodshed, and they therefore sometimes go beyond the point where patience ceases to be a virtue. The doctrin of blood atonement as we believe it is that there are crimes which cannot be atoned for in any other way than by shedding blood, but the time for carrying out the doctrin practically has not arrived."

If this is an intimation of what the church proposes to do when Utah shall become a state, and Mormons make the laws, the warning is well worth heeding. The shooting of Lee, for his participation in the Mountain Meadow massacre, ought to hav been followed by the hanging of all his fellow-murderers. The government may not suppress or persecute Mormonism, but it certainly is competent to punish crimes of such atrocious character. And in this new development of deviltry is seen the need of such education of the people as the National Liberal League is pledged to giv.

In dealing with religion the government should be purely secular. It should know nothing of belief, or doctrin, or creed. It should only know that a law has been violated, and punish the criminal accordingly. The present attempted suppression of Mormonism, through prosecution of polygamy, is the result of a rhetorical crusade of the church made last year, and partakes nearly as much of the nature of persecution as of punishment for laws violated. The abhorrence the Christians feel for their co-religionists springs not from love of virtue, and is consequently not a protest against immorality, but is the hatred of sect for sect which has ever been the cause of bitter persecution. The Mormons are too close scripture readers to be tolerated; they take the Bible literally, something the Protestant church of this country dare not do; they hav the courage of their convictions, which the Protestants hav not. Their horrible "blood atonement" is scriptural teaching, and their consistency is more to be admired than the Protestant acceptance of the book but rejection of its lessons. Nevertheless, crimes committed in the name of religion are none the less heinous, and murder done in the name of God must be punished in the name of man. But to be true to the truth, the attacks now being made on Mormonism should be transferred to the Bible, which is the spring of all their iniquity.

Clerico-Political Recrimination.

The Tribune of this city reports that in a Brooklyn congregation one hundred men had signed a paper pledging themselvs to vote for Mr. Blaine, but after the reverend Burchard's remark about rum and Romanism, ninety-two demanded the erasure of their names.

This is bad for the beaten candidate, but the query occurring to us is, What business had the officers of that church to be electioneering for anyone?

Mr. Burchard's famous remark is the cause of a good deal of heartburning. It is generally denounced by men of sense, but at the Baptist pastors' meeting the other night, the Rev. Justin D. Fulton came to the support of Mr. Burchard. "What was there in the address to frighten the Republicans?" he asked. "Do they not disapprove of rum? Don't they disapprove of rebellion? Don't they disapprove of Romanism dominating the country?" Further on in his discourse Mr. Fulton accused Mr. Blaine of being in league with the Catholics of this city and of corresponding with Cardinal McCloskey, who he said had pledged to Mr. Blaine the Catholic vote of this city. He also said that as Roman Catholic institutions received money from the state, the only thing for Protestants to do was to take all the money they could get.

Mr. Fulton was replied to by his brother pastors with fully as much acrimony as he himself evinced. The quarrel as it stands is a very pretty one, and between the falling out of the rogues honest men may get some inside information of the workings of the church in our politics.

Editorial Notes.

IN London, Ont., a Methodist church is being converted into a theater. The people of the town are to be congratulated.

A NEW translation of the "Laws of Menu," translated by Dr. Arthur Coke Burrell, will soon be published by Trubner & Co. This is based on the recent discoveries in Sanskrit literature, which hav given a clearer conception of the meaning of the work.

REV. J. M. WHITON writes in the New Englander against the moral effects of Sunday-school teaching, and the antichristian use of the Bible in Sunday-schools. He says, "The Sunday-school has been dosed with a decoction of crudities and untruths, biblical, historical, and moral, which has in most cases been as blindly swallowed as blindly administered."

THE Gananoque Reporter givs a long and very fair report of Mr. Charles Watts's recent lecture in that town. In speaking of Mr. Watts it says: "He is a man of undoubted ability, a fluent speaker, with no lack of choice language, and has evidently fully posted himself on the matters of which he treats." Considering that this high testimony to a Liberal's ability comes from a religious paper in the very hotbed of the orthodoxy of Ontario in Canada, it speaks well for the progress of Freethought views in the dominion.

REV. J. E. ROBERTS, for four years pastor of the First Baptist church of Kansas City, Mo., has been compelled to step down and out for preaching too much Rationalism. In his farewell sermon he reiterates his belief that "the interests of true religion demand a rational revision and restatement of old doctrins." Thus does the church condemn and punish honesty and intelligence. Thus does it offer a premium for hypocrisy and a reward for ignorance. Rev. Roberts is one of the very few who decline the reward.

THE Salamanca Convention which Mr. Green advertises in this week's TRUTH SEEKER bids fair to become a permanent annual institution. It surely will if well patronized by Liberals of this state and northern Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio. Every Liberal Convention held is one more nail in orthodoxy's coffin, and if it is a large gathering it assumes the dimensions of a spike. The speakers engaged at this one are a guarantee of its oratorical success, and with music and a sociable, attendance will repay a trip of several leagues.

Gov. HOADLY'S Thanksgiving proclamation is different from Gov. Cleveland's and from most of the other governors'. It reads:

"By virtue of authority conferred upon me by section 3,177 of the Revised Statutes, and in accordance with the old and time-honored custom, I hereby appoint Thursday, November 27th, as a public holiday, and invite the people of Ohio then to join in thanksgiving for the blessing of the year. Let us remember and act upon the principle that 'it is more blessed to giv than to receive,' so that in these days of widespread poverty, the more fortunate, by acts of charity and gifts bestowed in kindness, may enable all to share in the spirit and feeling of the occasion. Given under my hand and the great seal of the state of Ohio, at the city of Columbus, this 8th day of November, A.D. 1884. GEORGE HOADLY, Governor."

The Ohio State Journal comments that "one cannot but notice the entire absence of reference to the supreme being in the Thanksgiving proclamation of Gov. Hoadly." To many people the omission, as the Irishman would say, will appear the most sensible thing in it. There is no warrant in our Constitution for injecting a supreme being into the customs of the country merely to gratify the sodden superstition of a portion of the community. Would we had more officials like Gov. Hoadly of Ohio and Gov. Roberts of Texas, the only avowed Freethinkers now occupying gubernatorial chairs.

TRUBNER & Co., of London, will publish early in 1885 "The Life and Works of Giordano Bruno." He was the first to extend the doctrin of Copernicus to the whole universe, which he believed to be infinit; he reconciled the Immanence with the Transcendance of the deity, and in his works are to be found a foreshadowing of the theory of evolution, with a theory of instinct which is borne out by modern science. His philosophy is believed to hav influenced Shakspere. His best and most important Italian works were printed in London, two of them being dedicated to Sir Philip Sydney. His "Supper of Ashes," which takes place in the house of Sir Falke Grevette, contains a description of London in the time of Elizabeth, and of a disputation at Oxford, in which Bruno worsted his adversaries, the Dons. He died in the year 1600. Trubner & Co. hav also brought out two new volumes of their Oriental Series, "Si-Yu-ki." The "Si-Yu-ki," or "Memorials of the Western World," is a work prepared by the Chinese Buddhist pilgrim, Hieren Tsiang, from documents brought from India by himself in the seventh century. Written just before the rise of Islam, it is a work of the utmost value for the history of India, and is full of legend and old folk-lore. The Chinese original, now translated for the first time into English, is one of the works included in the magnificent collection of Buddhist books sent to the India Office in 1876 by the Japanese government. The twelve chapters of the original are comprised in the two volumes of the translation. The same publishers hav also brought out a new "Life of Buddha," and the early history of his order, derived from Tibetan works in the Bkoh-Hgyar and Bstan-Hgyar, followed by notices on the early history of Tibet and Khotea. Translated by W. Woodville Rockhill.

Answers to Inquiries.

S. GRAHAM.—You are right. The revision committee did not correct all the errors they found in the New Testament. The Englishmen were more conservativ than the Americans, and refused to adopt some of the latter's suggestions. We hav tried to ascertain the precise number, but are unable to do so. The revised Old Testament is expected this fall.

H. E. JUERGENS.—The plenary council at Baltimore was called before the result of the election was known. Its meeting has no perceptible political significance; though no doubt the mitred priests will concoct some scheme to further their undying hostility to free institutions. The public reason for the council is to adjust Catholic doctrin to American environments.

H. H. MINER.—1. The National Reform Association was established at Pittsburgh in 1863. 2. It is undenominational. 3. Its method for changing the Constitution is the legal one of a bill originating in either the House or Senate (a two-thirds vote being required) and being ratified by votes of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. 4. We do not know how many "direct Infidels" there are in the United States.

CHARLES S. CUTTING.—1. The Book of the Ascension of Isaiah has reached this century only in an Ethiopic version, which was published, along with a translation, in 1819. It is an apocryphal and pseudepigraphic [falsely ascribed authorship] work, of which scarcely anything is known. It is probable, according to Baring-Gould, that it existed in Greek originally. Only a person of Renan's extensiv scholarship would be apt to quote it in these days. Its story is that while Isaiah was speaking to the King Hezekiah, he suddenly stopped and his soul was borne away by an angel. He traversed the firmament, where he saw the strife of the angels and demons. He entered the seventh heaven, where the events of futurity were revealed to him. When he came to his senses, he told the King Hezekiah all he had seen and heard, except that which concerned Hezekiah's son Manasseh, which was to the effect that when his father passed away, Manasseh would persecute the saints. Isaiah only revealed this when Hezekiah was at the point of death. Then the king would hav slain Manasseh, for he said he would rather leave no posterity than a son who would persecute saints. But Isaiah restrained him, and Manasseh reigned and was a cruel tyrant. He worshiped idols, and sought to force Isaiah to do the same, and when Isaiah would not, Manasseh sawed him asunder with a saw of wood. 2. The Book of Enoch is another apocryphal book. It contains one hundred and eight chapters. Its authorship is unknown, as is the date of its writing. It is quoted in Jude. Johnson's Cyclopedia says that "critical conjecture" places its date from 144 B.C. to 135 A.D. The early Christian fathers used it, but for some centuries only fragments of it were known to European scholars, till in 1773 James Bruce brought home with him from Africa three copies of an Ethiopic version of it, made apparently from the Greek about 350 or 400 A.D. It was published in 1838 by Archbishop Laurence, who had previously (in 1821) published an English translation of it, and by Professor Dillman (1851). The book contains many curious passages, but its leading idea is that of divine justice dealing sternly with sinners. 3. The Sibylline verses were quoted as authority and appropriated to their own religion by the early Christians, notably Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria (who calls the Sibyl a prophetess of the Hebrews), and Lactantius in his "Divine Institutes."

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG is now lecturing in Nebraska and Missouri. He will come East about Dec. 1st.

W. F. JAMIESON, at the close of his Seward, Nebraska, lectures, will go to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and deliver a lecture Sunday evening, Nov. 23d. During December he will fill his Minnesota and Dakota engagements. Address at Lake City, Minn.

The Fourth Gospel Probably the Oldest.

The Gospel according to John has generally been supposed and conceded to be the latest of the four; but a suspicion has arisen among the rational critics that after all it may turn out to be the earliest. The "Man of Sin" is happy to confirm that suspicion. After having discovered so many of the characters named or described in the book of Acts who flourished in the century before the Christian era, it occurred to him to search in Josephus for two persons named only in the fourth gospel, and here is the result:

1. Nicodemus. When Pompey was in the region of Damascus, 64 B.C., the two brothers, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, contestants for the Jewish crown, each sent an embassador to the Roman general; and the name of Aristobulus's minister was Nicodemus. He therefore answers to John's Nicodemus—"a man of the Pharisees" and "a ruler of the Jews." (Jos. Ant. xiv, 3, §2.)

2. Malchus, whose right ear was cut off by Simon Kepha, answers to Malichus, who poisoned Antipater, the father of Herod the Great, and was in turn assassinated by command of the Roman general, Cassius, at the request of Herod, about 43 B.C. (Ant. xiv, 11; War. i, 11.) Malichus was at the time of his death in company with the high priest Hyracanus, who succeeded his father, Alexander Janneus, about 78 B.C., and was consequently high priest when Jesus was stoned and hanged in the reign of Alexandra, widow of Janneus and mother of Hyrcanus. The real name of the servant of the high priest in the fourth gospel is Malich. (See Dr. Murdock's side note, Syr. N. T., John xviii, 10.) Josephus has added os to the name, in conformity to the Greek idiom, and the New Testament Greek scribe has not only done the same, but has inadvertently dropped the letter i.

ANTICHRIST A.M.

P.S.—The epistle of Clement of Rome (that is, the first or genuin one) was erroneously stated in our last article to belong to the Tischendorf discovery of 1844 and 1859. The only copy of the epistle extant until Bryennios discovered another in 1875, was the one belonging to the Alexandrian Codex of 1628, now in the British Museum. Its original composition must be assigned to a time a little prior to that of the "Teaching of the Apostles," probably before A.D. 1.

ANTIC.

The People's Day.

The people's day is breaking,
The fog-bank disappears;
The sons of toil are waking
From the false dream of years.
Each coming of election
More thoughtful ballots bear,
And bullets in connection,
To shoot in freedom's war.

Chorus: Then hail the rising people,
The dawn of manhood hail;
Pull down both church and steeple,
Build schools, instead of jails.

Arouse, ye sons of labor,
And vote yourselvs a place;
Let each respect his neighbor,
And thought lend work a grace.
The day is fast approaching
When gold shall rule no more,
And knowledge is encroaching
Where credence was before.

Chorus: Then hail the rising people, etc.

The age of priestcraft dying,
And reason's era born;
Old superstition flying,
In fear of freedom's morn;
No more to phantoms kneeling,
Man bows to blocks no more,
But his own honor feeling,
Shows ghosts and gods the door,

Chorus: Then hail the rising people, etc.

The slaves, their shackles cleaving,
Will eat the bread they earn;
And servants, masters leaving,
Will falling dog-crumbs spurn.
The people's day is dawning,
Where terror long has lain;
Arise, for now 'tis morning,
And man has come to reign.

Chorus: Then hail the rising people, etc.

JOHN P. GUILD.

India Ahead.

It seems strange that Freethinkers in far-off India should be more progressiv than we are, and that they are quicker to adopt our glorious "year of science" calendar than many Americans—among whom it was suggested and invented—hav shown themselvs to be; but I hav received publications from distant Calcutta, published by nativ East-Indians, which hav our grand Freethought banner of A.S. 284 printed on them and, being given out in both the English and Bengali languages, can be read by the crazy "missionaries of the cross," as well as by their deluded followers and dupes.

These "poor heathen" can already see what so many of the more favored "children of civilization" do not seem to see as yet, viz., that it is entirely out of character, and is, in fact, a complete stultification, for antichristians to continue the use of a regular Christian calendar, and keep on forever dating in the old superstitious "year of our Lord!"

It seems to me that all who do so continue richly merit the contemptuous scorn which a Boston clergyman meted out last year to Freethinkers, when he declared that we Liberals had to "come to Christ" for everything, even for a calendar to date in! The Investigator published his remarks at the time, and told his lying reverence that we had a calendar of our own, and that it dated from the beginning of our modern science, and not from the birth of some monstrous and impossible "Lord and savior."

Is it not high time that all free and enlightened people dropped the ridiculous nonsense of using a humbug calendar, and fully adopted a style of dating which has truth to recommend it, and which, besides relieving us of the wrong and inconsistencies of using a fraudulent era, will, at the same time, work great good for our own cause?

Yours fraternally, REMLY S. SIDELINGER.

Letters from Friends.

ST. CATHERINE'S, CAN., Oct. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please accept the small pittance which I send with this as subscription, and more anon. I presume you are all red-hot and boiling over with election matters just now.

You are dubbed a great nation of wise people, but there is one thing in your election manipulations which I much disliko, and which should be disliked by every one possessed of dignity and respect; which is, so soon as a candidate is made choice of, for your presidency more especially, so soon you commence to slander and vilify his character from birth up. and if you do not find enough that is truthful to satiate your seemingly inborn desires to calumniate, you manufacture falsehoods and add thereto.

Now the way I view such matters is, that the general moral character of a man who consents to become a candidate for any office should not be referred to at all, for how few are possessed of sound morality!

If a man's morals are sufficiently substantial for his business matters in private life, then why not sufficient for public life? What constitutes the difference? It must be very humiliating to anyone of passable or average respectability to be exposed to public sarcasm ahd sneer, and would deter many well qualified to fill an office from accepting a nomination. It is a pity that you, as a nation, could not dispose of it in your elections, for it is a degrading, dignity-destroying manipulation which no respectable nation should be guilty of.

But methinks I hear some one saying you had better renovate your own election manipulations before taking exceptions to others. I am quite aware that Canada, I am sorry to say, is too freely patterning after their cousins on your side, in said matter, which I wish they might hereafter refrain from; but I am also aware that political excitement, not being dictated by sound judgment and principles, is untamable, and many will say, no donbt, that what cannot be cured must be endured, if it is debasing. Another thing I take exception to wherever perpetrated, which is nicknaming. It is quite annoying to human dignity wherever possessed, and I notice that in a majority of cases those who are addicted to the habit are diminutiv in mind, dignity, and stature, and think that by nicknaming those of superior knowledge and wisdom, it brings them on a par with themselvs, but they are much mistaken. Any one possessed of good common sense will not coincide with that idea.

To illustrate, I will mention the name of Robert G. Ingersoll. How many there are who, in speaking of him, instead of calling him by his correct name, as common decency would dictate, call him "Bob" Ingersoll, when in truth he is possessed of more knowledge, wit, and wisdom, in one day, than a majority of such will be possessed of in a whole life-time. Could they but see themselvs as others see them, they would be mortified of their own supposed smartness in so doing. But envy and spite will ooze out now and again with such people. Be it as it may, vulgarity will never increase a deficiency of brain.

Mr. Watts is still busy with us over here, and doing much good. Our orthodox divines decline as yet to take the platform with him. I heard him deliver a discourse in Toronto to a goodly audience, on "Christianity and its claims." He is a fine and powerful speaker, clear and distinct in his enunciation, and every expression in its proper place to giv effect. When through, a Salvation Army soldier took the stand and made some opposition remarks, and offered to take the platform with him. He also related the horrible death of an Infidel banker in Montreal. Mr. Watts, in reply, said that his engagements were such that he could not spare the time to argue with a man of straw (which evidently he was). He also asked him to giv the name and circumstances of the Infidel's horrible death, that he might learn of its truthfulness, for every now and again we were hearing of such horrible deaths, but invariably they proved a fizzle in the end. The soldier came to his feet again, and said that as the occurrence took place a number of years ago, he had forgotten the name, the result of which brought a pronounced demonstration from the audience against the reliability of his assertion. The audience then dispersed, seemingly well pleased with the evening's entertainment.

C. B. THOMPSON.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Oct. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am owing Mr. Slenker, of Snowville, $1.00. He writes me, "Send it to the Watts and Putnam lecture fund." I inclose it; you will be kind enough to see that it fulfils its purpose.

I hav been reading the articles on vivisection—pro and con—with much interest. I admire and respect Mr. Preston for his love and care of our humble friends, the brutes, yet I believe laymen will get the impression that useless, experimental torture of these animals is much more common than it really is. In attending seven courses of medical lectures in the best colleges in the land; five courses of clinical lectures in the largest, best conducted hospitals, and at least a dozen private courses with able, practical professors, I hav never seen but four cases of vivisection, and never hav dabbled in it myself. We call the lower animals brutes. As I study them I find very many of them superior to numbers of human beings whom I hav known. Mr. Preston has my most hearty "good speed you" in all he does for their protection.

Since reading friend Chainey's address at Cassadaga, I've been thinking a great deal of what he has said about the immoral conduct of many Liberals. We look for no human perfection among Christians or Liberals, but the one, wherever he is, whoever he may be, livs the best life, who has been right generated, borne by his mother, and taught to do the beautiful right because it is right, not because of fear of punishment or hope of reward. Our penitentiaries are filled with people who firmly believe in an eternal hell This belief could not influence their conduct enough to keep them from crime. Their mothers, as they carried them beneath their hearts, could hav done it. It is a most certain thing that if we are born under the proper conditions, and taught to love and act the true and good for their own worth, we will be morally fine; if the reverse, we will be morally coarse. It is no use; our natures will out whether we believe much or little. We cannot expect the best good for ourselvs or for those whom we influence if we do not daily liv the best life we can.

Our friend refers to smoking and beer-drinking on the principle of "We will get all the pleasure we can out of this short life." I am puzzled to know how an intellectual, poetic mind can be so eager after the lower pleasures even if it believes this life is all. There are plenty of finer, sweeter ones of which we can daily take our fill; pleasures that will build us up morally and physically; pleasures that we can enjoy in the presence of sweet, lovely children, knowing if they enjoy the same they will be better, healthier, nobler men and women.

Against true Spiritualism, if there be such a thing, I hav nothing to say; yet it seems to me I would rather liv out my individuality, blaze my own way, than to hav spirits taking care of me as if I were a baby; then, too, the question arises, "What relation between the ego and the moral quality of the act if spirits or bodies compel me to do a thing or to refrain from doing it?" It seems to me I would be as irresponsible as the little child under the first years of parental government.

But I am making my letter too long. Permit me to say, however, that I was delighted with your brother George's letters from Maine. That is my nativ state, and I hav many times been over some of the same ground. Giv him my respects, and tell him if he wants something double-extra grand to practice his facil pen on, to come to Colorado next summer. We will make him welcome.

MRS. H. L. BUCKNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. INGERSOLL.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Oct. 30, 1884.

R. G. INGERSOLL, Dear Sir: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 18th that you were interviewed by a reporter of the San Francisco Post on your arrival in that city. In answer to his questions you are reported to hav said: "The only great question now is protection, and I am satisfied that is in no possible danger."

Believing you to be a protectionist, and I being a consumer of goods on which tariff is paid—not a manufacturer, but simply a Western laborer—and believing you to be able (if any one is) to show me in what way I am protected or benefited by a tariff, I take the liberty of asking you to do so, as there are very many desiring information on the same point.

Again, "As long as the federal government collects taxes or revenue on imports, just so long these revenues will be arranged to protect home manufacturers." How does tariff benefit manufacturers, save the owners of factories or large wholesale dealers, and that at the expense of all consumers and laborers not directly connected with the factory? And as those are greatly in the minority, it does not seem just to protect a few at the expense of the many, and enable them, by class legislation, to become millionaires, while those that do the work for them liv on corn-meal and water, as the miners of Ohio hav had to do.

It is a common argument that tariff keeps up wages, but I think you would find by becoming a common laborer, with no other income but your wages to support a family, that wages were very poorly kept up. Hoping you or some one else may enlighten me on this question, I am

Yours for free trade. H. H. HUTCHESON.

KIRKSVILLE, Mo., Nov. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Having just finished "Elmina's" last letter as published pertaining to Spiritualism, it reminds me of a little experience I had the last summer at a spiritual camp-meeting in Iowa, which I wish to relate. I went to this meeting more for recreation than anything else. On the day of my arrival, in walking over the grounds I noticed upon many of the tents and houses cards or signs denoting different kinds of business or phases of mediumship. The thought struck me that as a pastime and out of curiosity I would call on one of the occupants for a "sitting." I approached a tent on which I read the following: "Mrs. Weeks, Trance and Test Medium." I went to the opening; was politely invited in and given a seat. After making the object of my call known, she seated herself in front of me and soon went into what seemed a trance or unconscious state, when she or her control said: "I am Sunbeam." I said, "Sunbeam, are any of my spirit relativs here?" She answered, "Yes; both on your side and the side of your wife." I asked, "Who are they?" She said, "Your uncle David is here; your aunt Elizabeth, your aunt Sally, your cousin Gilbert, your aunt Hannah, your sister Olive, who passed over with consumption, your son Clarence, and your little boy who passed over with diphtheria, and your little girl; your aunt Nancy, Myra, a relativ, your brother Edd, but think he is still in the form; (not dead) your son Henry, but think he is still in the form; (not dead) George, a soldier, brother to your wife, died in the army; and Mary, sister to your wife The above, as far as names, etc., are concerned, is all correct. Mary, of whom I had never heard, I find died over forty years ago. Some of my relativs named I had entirely forgotten; not having seen or heard from them since a small boy (am now in my 57th year), but who were brought fresh to my mind on hearing their names. Some of the parties I know not where they are, and do not know that they are dead. She also gave me the state of my birth, and followed me up from childhood in moving from one state to another until the present time. These things I noted upon paper as I received them in the tent. I will say that the medium and myself were entire strangers, and I do not know even now where she resides. I hav never termed myself a Spiritualist, but these things and other things I could relate, and phenomena in my own family, are a mystery to me. If the Spiritualistic view is not correct, who can explain? I think Elmina a little inclined to ridicule, but perhaps in her investigations she has fallen in with frauds, and Truesdell perhaps the biggest fraud of all.

WILLIAM HART.

SALAMANCA, Oct. 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Will you be so kind and obliging as to telephone over to 55 East 9th street, and say to that dear friend of yours, S. P. Putnam, that I wish to interview him on a most serious and solemn subject, one that is dear to my heart?

S. P. PUTNAM, Sir: Allow me to address your high mightiness through THE TRUTH SEEKER by asking you to explain certain statements, or comparison, rather, in your article last week addressed to George Chainey. Please allow me to present for your inspection your own words, which turned my usually composed countenance into a solemn and wrathful frown, and brought the even temperature of my temper, which is one of my characteristics, up to 140 in a second.

I ask as a favor that every Liberal lady in the land will interpret this statement according to her own judgment. With my sensitiv nature and high notions, I purpose to take exceptions to that remark. Taking into consideration the many good and sensible things you said at Cassadaga, I am half convinced that it must hav been a slip of the pen. But here it is: "You hav not done what a plain, level-headed, practical business man would hav done. You hav been a woman, really, a mad poet, but not a wise philosopher." May the nine muses shield us from such a thrust. Mr. Putnam, your brotherly advice to Chainey was good. Will you please take a dose of the same good advice, which I quote: "Now, my boy, I simply wish you to back down from your position as gracefully as you can; admit your error of judgment, and make an apology. Act honorably in this matter, and with courage. Don't be afraid to beg pardon when your conscience must tell you that you hav done wrong."

I havn't forgotten that Mr. Charles Watts made the same little blunder at Cassadaga, and Mr. Watts must fix that little matter if he expects a warm and friendly reception from the Liberal bodies of Salamanca.

Men hav weaknesses as well as women, and are quite liable to inherit them from their fathers, and I insist on knowing why, when you find in your own sex a man whose emotional and poetical nature makes him a reed in the wind, or another with softening of the brain; in fact, all who are mentally weak must be compared to a woman.

I leave this to your kind consideration, and wait your answer in high dudgeon.

THERESE SOBIESKI.

STEWARD, ILL., Nov. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: To-day is election day. I hope in the near future we shall be able to support a candidate of our own—a noble Liberal. I am young yet; hav read the great Hunting Book through three times, beside learning many portions by heart. I was brought up to believe it, every word, until my reason got the better of my belief. But I am glad that I know what is contained in the Bible. I also hav a copy of the Koran, which, I think, is superior to our Bible; it helps me to refute the arguments of Christians. I am an open enemy of the clergy. We hav had several cases of suicide in this vicinity, all Christians, and our minister, the Rev. Mr. Linn, took occasion to preach a sermon on Infidelity. He said that the unbelievers were fast killing themselvs off by suicide (a misrepresentation). It was more than I could stand. I wrote an article giving him the lie direct. I tried the Steward Leader; it would not print it for fear of losing a few paltry subscriptions. Then I sent it to the Rochelle Register; the editor, a man of brains, printed it for me. It was answered by a few Christians (I also received several private letters advising me that it was better for me to let such matters alone). Our friends turned in and helped me, among the number, Mr. Otto Wettstein, of Rochelle, Ills. The debate lasted for five months, ending, Freethought ahead. I had no idea how many Liberals there were here, but a hearty handshake, and, "That was good," or "Giv it to 'em!"—such sentences as these convince me that I hav gained stanch friends.

I send you an article clipped from the weekly Inter-Ocean of Oct. 30th—would it not be well to reproduce it? I would like to correspond with one or more of the young lady readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER; the young ladies here nearly all belong to the church. I hav most of R. G. Ingersoll's lectures, and some of his books. I lend them to my Christian friends, and they hav done a great deal of good.

Yours respectfully, FRANK HOLCOMB.

AMERICUS, MISS., Oct. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is the hardest times down here in south Mississippi that ever were known. Times are worse than they were during the Rebellion. Lumber business is stopped entirely, and if a man has got anything to sell he cannot get the money for it.

I must say something for THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best paper I ever hav found in my life, and I am twenty-nine years old. I am yet a single man; but if I was going to get married, and my girl didn't believe in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I would just quit her and look for another one. It drives out all superstitious belief in things that can't be, nor ever were, nor ever will be. I am a Freethinker of the land, and I don't see how I could do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mine is the only paper of that kind that comes anywhere near this section of the country. The preachers and Christians hav been raising, or trying to raise, thunder about it, but can't do much with me. They call me an Infidel, and I call them hypocrits. A good many of the Christians and parsons will go to the church house and pray and preach, and before they get home they will try to beat somebody out of something.

The Christians down here believe in a hell and a heaven, god and devil, and say that the sins we commit will carry us to a hell, a burning lake of fire and brimstone, unless we repent of our sins. But let a man or woman get sick or crippled for a long time, and the most of the people will say, "Look at that fellow; he is down with rheumatism." And they will say, "That's for his [or her] wickedness;" and if it is in my presence I always ask them if they believe that, and the most of them do. I tell them if that is the case, hell is here on earth, and that is all the hell anybody will see.

I had rather two Infidels would testify against me than one hypocrit. The book tells us that God made the world in six days, and rested, or finished, on the seventh day, and that all he made was good, and that God foreknew all things. If this is so, why was God sorry he made man? If any man or woman believes this story, they ought to hav a negro boy for a guardian.

I will do, and hav been doing, all I can for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and intend to take it so long as I liv, if I can pay for it. W. E. WALTERS.

PORTLAND, OR., Oct. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: After many days, I will send a few lines to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. I hail it as a welcome friend, full of truths and good tidings to all. I enjoy reading letters from different writers in other parts of the world, and perhaps others would like to hear of the sayings and doings of Liberals and non-Liberals from this Western shore. I will try and giv a few items as to how I view the situation in Oregon. We hav a large Liberal element here, but for want of energy and means they fail to keep up an organization. Many of them are like myself—do not hav an over-abundance of this world's goods; but for all that, if a few energetic men and women would put their shoulders to the wheel, meetings could be made a success. But Liberalism is gaining ground, in spite of narrow-minded bigots to clog her wheels. Since Colonel Ingersoll was here we feel more like holding up our heads. What grand and glorious truths he uttered! They fell like rain upon the parched earth, and we felt it was good to hav been there.

Two incidents happened while I was in the little city of Salem, Oregon, that I would like to mention. About the time Colonel Ingersoll was to speak in said city, a rabid Christian came out in print and denounced the non-rabid Christians who had the colonel's picture in their windows.

The other is of a poor unfortunate man found sleeping in the house of God, and the pastor, Mr. Chambers, the follower of the meek and lowly, caned him so severely he had to hav his head sewed up, and then turned him over to the tender mercies of the law. Christian spirit, wasn't it? We read that the Son of Man had not where to lay his head, and I suppose the poor tramp was in the same fix. No doubt this same priest thought it sacrilegious to see the colonel's pictures in the windows. I will leave the readers to draw their own conclusions. Comments are useless.

MRS. O. A. BENJAMIN.

BISHOP CREEK, CAL., Oct. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I often feel like joining in some of the discussions going on in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but being a Spiritualist, or one who hopes for, and believes in, a future state, I fear to encounter the rude blows of some who hold that this life ends all. I hav read with great interest the doings of the Liberals at Cassadaga Lake (near the home where I was reared), and hav felt much interested in Mr. Chainey's conversion to Spiritualism. I am sorry to see professed Liberals so illiberal as some of them appear to be. I had hoped that the dogmatic spirit might be dropped with the dogmas they hav left behind and are still combating, yet no less so than those who hav hopes of a life beyond. As to the phenomena of Spiritualism, they are but the alphabet, out of which may be spelled the sentence, "We still liv." I hope Elmina will be able to bring to the light facts and truths relating to another life, if possible. One correspondent said he was "sorry Mr. Chainey had left us." Whom has he left? Has he gone ahead, or fallen back, or turned aside, from following wherever truth or his convictions lead? I thought his lecture at Cassadaga Lake splendid, had it not been that he struck uncalled-for blows at those who had aided him to gain the hights and freedom few attain.

I do not think the emotions should be repressed, but wisely trained, since these are the motiv power of the intellect, the same, in comparison, as the fires that create the steam for the engin. But some, it seems to me, advocate putting the wood into the boilers instead of the furnaces, producing but little moral force, as the intellect, when separated from the emotions, is but a glittering iceberg, which needs the fires of the emotional nature, though at times volcanic and erratic, to transform it into hills and vales of love and beauty. I may be wrong in my way of thinking, but I am searching for truth from day to day, and am ever glad to be shown the better way.

MRS. L. HUTCHINSON.

NEWARK VALLEY, N. Y., Oct. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The friendly letter containing my bill due THE TRUTH SEEKER came duly to hand, and its contents hav been noted and duly appreciated, for which I am truly thankful. Your bill should hav been paid long ago, but, to make a long matter short, I am too "cussed" poor to meet my honest dues. When I stated the time I should send you the money, I was sick, and spent the money that I intended to send you to pay doctor's bill. I intended to pay up and stop the paper, for I am at present so embarrassed I am not able to take it, and if you will stop the paper I will pay up just as soon as I possibly can. Still, I shall feel lost without THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is why I hav let it run so long. I hav hoped I would stem the tide and soon pay up and continue my subscription. I hav been, and still am, one of those peculiar unfortunates that fate seems to be against. I could write you a sad history of misfortunes, but what is the use? In the last two years I hav lost—died on my hands—four horses, two cows, and seventy-five dollars' worth of hogs. At this present writing, I hav a horse worth a hundred and fifty dollars lying on the barn floor, which will probably be dead before morning. I liv in one of the most priest-ridden communities on top of God's footstool. They say it is because I am such an Infidel that god (excuse me, I hav not reverence enough to spell god with a capital G) is punishing me by killing my horses, my cows, and my pigs. I say to them, "This is characteristic of your God; he never had manhood or bravery enough to meet an opponent face to face, but sneaks around and kills his opponent's domestic animals, or burns up his house or barn with his thunderbolts. If their God is such a creature as that, the farthest I can get away from him will be the nearest heaven I expect to get.

I am the only man in the town, and I don't know but in the county, that has got backbone enough to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, though there are hundreds that are at heart just as much opposed to the Christian fraud as I am. I hav been a successful school-teacher for years, but I am now a marked man. All the influence of this priest-ridden community is brought to bear against me. I could not possibly get even a common district school where my religious belief is known. But you can "bet your life" that I don't fail to let it be known whenever the opportunity offers.

If I don't get THE TRUTH SEEKER any more, I can keep pretty well posted by reading over back numbers, for I hav preserved them all. A part of them I hav bound in volume form, and intend to hav the others bound also as soon as I get able. Yours truly, E. W. COUNCILMAN.

NORSE, TEXAS, Oct. 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It isn't often that you get a communication from Norse, and for the purpose of assuring you that we havn't entirely backslidden, I offer you a few lines. There being but few Liberals at this place we can but seldom afford the luxury of a Liberal lecture. But when we find a lecturer disposed to take in our little place on his rounds and thankfully receive our widow's mite, we always employ him.

We lately had the pleasure of listening to a couple of lectures by Mr. J. L. Andrew, of Kansas; subjects, "Morality," and "Infidelity." Mr. Andrew is a young man of about twenty-five years of age, an Englishman by birth, and has but lately espoused the cause of Liberalism. Intending to devote his life to the Christian ministry, he soon found that procrustean bed too short and narrow for his intellect and sympathy, and so had the manhood and courage to abandon it at once and resolve to consecrate his life to the propagation of the religion of humanity. Mr. Andrew has, to a considerable degree, the natural gifts of the orator. Slightly under medium hight, of large, rotund figure; full, deep, and musical voice; in manner natural, logical, forcible, and eloquent; witty, sarcastic, humorous and serious by turn, he holds the attention of his audiences from beginning to end.

Materialistic in views, yet he is not a dogmatist. He will remain in Texas during the present month; open to lecture engagements, and those wishing his services can address him in care of Mr. J. D. Shaw, Waco, Texas.

Texas is a great field for the Liberal propagandism, for those who are willing to do missionary work, who are not mercenary, but count it but gain if, through their sacrifices, people are emancipated from mental thraldom.

In conclusion, I wish you abundant success in your noble efforts in battling for the rights of man.

Yours fraternally, E. A. ROLIN.

DODGE CITY, KAN., Oct. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Having noticed, on several occasions, the cowardly and dishonest acts of some of our divines, published in the columns of your valuable paper, I thought it would not be out of place to send you a clipping from the Dodge City Democrat of this week. It is a letter from a practicing physician of this city. If there are any more publications pertaining to the case on either side, I will foward them to you.

Yours for truth, R. E. NYE.

P.S.—While I am writing this at the hotel, I discover one of those so-called agents of God looking of my shoulder.

R. E. N.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

I wish to call the attention of the religious as well as the Infidel portion of the community to the numerous acts of one Rev. Mr. Elliott, a so-called minister of the gospel of the Methodist persuasion. I believe his many kind and Christian acts call for this public notice, and being disposed at all times to giv the devil his dues, I take this method of calling particular attention to the reverend gentleman above named. I will not attempt, however, to enter into any lengthy details, as to the moral or Christian character of this canting hypocrit, as I hav no desire to pollute the columns of your much respected paper, which would be inevitable were I to do so. I will confine myself to one of his recent acts, which I believe will suffice to demonstrate all there is in him. Last week I attended the Hutchinson fair, and while absent, this sanctimonious desecrator of the teachings of Christ jumped my claim, which I had selected as a home for myself and family. Of course I can get another one, as there is plenty of land in Kansas, but that is not the thing; in the event of my locating another claim, what assurance would I hav that some other preacher of the Elliott stripe wouldn't steal it the first time I left the city? I hav always had very serious doubts about Methodist preachers being the inspired agents of God, and since this occurrence I feel that my doubts hav been based upon very good grounds. If heaven is to be the final abode of such cowardly, thieving, hypocritical medicants as Mr. Elliott, I prefer an eternal residence with his Satanic Majesty.

In conclusion, I would say that I shall hesitate to make known my claim in heaven, for fear this unscruplous, perjuring land thief might try to jump it. DR. M. G. COCKEY.

NEWPORT, ME., Nov. 2., 1884.

MR. EDITOR: You can bear witness that I hav not written a word for your paper on the political question, and I can say THE TRUTH SEEKER has taken an impartial stand on this insane subject. What I wish to say is, that while I hav earnestly desired that James G. Blaine would never be president, there is no cause for a true reformer to rejoice over the election of Grover Cleveland, for, no matter what party may be in power, the principles of government will remain the same. It is despotism; though in a milder form than monarchical government, still it is despotism, and no true reformer can support it. And, as a man who has a purpose in life; something to liv for every waking hour, I enter my solemn and earnest protest against every form of government as it now exists, because to exist it outrages my natural and inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Because all governments of force are in constant warfare on the rights of the individual, and, as in the case of the Christian church, if it were not for the ignorance of the people, they could not exist for a day. And as reformers, we must not forget that these political campaigns are fearfully demoralizing and corrupting to good morals. If the people were not on a very low plain, they would hav rejected James G. Blaine with scorn and indignation, after he lowered himself by allowing a court to interrogate him in relation to his moral life. That one act ought to hav damned him politically for the rest of his life. In the language of Whittier:

"Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide."

Then was the time for Mr. Blaine to rise to the dignity of a man and say, "Not one word of explanation will I make to any one concerning my private life." If Mr. Blaine loses the presidency, as reported, that one act of wrecking his manhood by allowing himself to be catechised as he did will be the cause, for "there's a law of compensation, and a law of retribution for each mortal and each nation."

SEWARD MITCHELL.

P. S.—I wish to send my choicest and best blessing to Lewise Oliver, for her grand letter in the last TRUTH SEEKER, for of all the thousands of inspired letters in the paper of all others, THE TRUTH SEEKER, that letter is the best. If any of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav a copy of the paper of October 18th to spare, and will mail it to me, they shall receive my best thanks. S. M.

MILLBANK, ONT., Oct. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed one dollar, for which please giv me credit on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I liv in an orthodox community, where superstition sways the scepter over science, and the religious traditions of a past credulous period are still accepted as infallible and true. Reared by strictly orthodox parents in a land of mental night, my journey from faith to reason, as might be supposed, was beset by many difficulties and obstacles, but by the aid of the writings of such intellectual giants as Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, and Tyndall, I gradually succeeded in outgrowing the creed of my youth, and now rejoice in the conscious glorious knowledge that I am mentally free. A. D. RUTHERFORD.

OGDEN, UTAH, Oct. 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It appears to me rather singular that the National Liberal League has never proposed a plan to provide for the naming of children born to Liberal parents. I think something ought to be done in this respect. You are aware, of course, that Infidels, as unbelievers in the Bible, do not care to practice the orthodox style. Now I propose that blank forms be printed; to be furnished by the secretary of National Liberal League—auxiliary Liberal Leagues generally; said forms to hav blank spaces for signature of president, vice-president, and secretary of National Liberal League or auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and recorded in League registers, etc.

Mr. Mercer, of this city, is erecting an Agnostic Hall, to be used by our League, now organizing, and which will be ready by the first of November or thereabouts. We expect Mr. Putnam and Mr. Watts this fall or winter.

If there ever was a religion that could make good, strong Infidels and Spiritualists it is Mormonism. In your last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, speaking of Catholic Irish, you state that they are low, ignorant, etc. This is caused as much by English rule as priestcraft, and is not for the want of brains, as is seen in the sterling qualities of the Irish in this country. In conclusion, I will say, as a mechanic, that Butler, in my opinion, is the best representativ of the workingmen in America. Very truly, NEIL A. PARKS.

MOSCOW MILLS, MO., Oct. 23, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Not long since I asked a "sky pilot" where heaven was located, and he said that the heavenly New Jerusalem was away up in the blue vaults of space. I said to him, "How do you know that heaven is up in the skies?" "Well, good Christians," he said, "are shown heaven on their death-beds by the power of Christ." Great power that! "Well, Brother Isaac," said I, "I would like to hav some proof of the existence of that place called heaven that you speak of. I hav soared through the blue vaults of space, astronomically and scientifically, and hav not seen heaven yet. I hav surveyed the mighty circumference of the moon, and hav explored the mighty plains, hills, and valleys of the same, and I see no traces of that bright city; the golden city of God, walled and paved with pure gold. Where, oh where is it? It is not there, and I hav gone to the remotest corner of space—which is as far as our astronomical observations will permit us to go—and it is not there. I come back from the aerial regions with the displeasure of not finding heaven, and not finding the Christian's golden fort. I now go up and down the earth searching for that place, where all the wretches and vile sinners of earth hath gone."

There is nothing I so despise as I do the Christian religion. Please understand me, my pious friends; it is not the people that I despise and loathe; it is their superstitious doctrins. The venomous reptile of earth, the viper and the adder, in my estimation, are a credit to the Christian religion.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5. I cannot understand how any Freethinker can read your valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and not become a regular subscriber. Of course I want it, and you can put me down for a life subscriber. I could not keep house without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and good old Boston Investigator, to brighten up things every week. I will try and get you some new subscribers in this place. Please credit me with one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the balance, $2 00, you will oblige me by paying to Samuel P. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Full River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Letter in Rhyme.

My darling little children, I always like to hear
Of dogs, and cats, and horses, of birds and babies dear;
And if you think you'll like it, I'm sure we shall agree,
For I can sometimes tell you of what I chance to see.
Just two doors from my cottage there livs a darling dog,
With brown hair short and curly, and round as any log,
For Fido likes good living, like meat, mince pies, and cake;
Of everything that's dainty, he gladly will partake.

From out a deep bay window he looks upon the street,
And when familiar faces his honest eyes can greet,
He barks a gladsome welcome that's dog-like, true, and kind,
Then brings them rags or slippers, or first thing he can find.

One day I said, "Dear Fido, my darling good old boy,
Bring something of more value to testify your joy,
For then I can grow wealthy, and, living at my ease,
I'll take both you and kitty, and we'll do what we please."

The next time I came homeward, dear Fido followed me,
His eyes and feet came dancing, in activ, merry glee.
And when within my doorway, he laid upon the floor
A large silk spool of value, fresh from the city store;
Then, in my face upglancing, his bright eyes seemed to say,
"Now is this to your liking, what I hav brought to-day?"
I thanked him, and I wondered, as Fido kissed my hand,
How much of human language a dog could understand.

And once I placed some "extras" within a china cup,
And in my garden pathway asked Fido o'er to sup.
He did, then took politely the cup with sober grace,
And round the house he trotted, and put it in its place.
Ah, Fido! liv and flourish; and if, like you, we're kind,
As faithful, true, and genile, the world will surely find
That all can help to banish the clouds of sin and hate,
And face, with hearts uplifted, love's sunlit golden gate.

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

Montagew and His Yacht.

Montagew Hardicooper was a slim youth with fluffy lungs and a perpetual hacking cough. His cheeks were hollow, his shoulders stooped, there was a consumptiv darkness under his eyes, and his hair looked dry and dead, like the moss upon a rock. People, at the time this account opens, gave him a year to liv. There was one person, however, who had not placed young Hardicooper's funeral at so early a date. This was his younger brother Duff, who had better advantages for observing Montagew's symptoms, and he argued that as long as that youth's performances at the dinner table were sustained, his demise could not be located in the imm ediate future. Nevertheless the cough troubled Duff, and he watched his brother's health with tender interest.

Montagew lived in New York, and afternoons in the summer he used to go wandering about the wharves, looking at the vessels that lay in the dock, thrusting their long bowsprits, laden with iron martingales, across the street, almost into the windows on the opposit side. He looked at the towering spars with awe, and his respect for a seafaring man fell little short of veneration. Later on he got in the habit of visiting Port Morris, just above the city, where he would sit upon the shore of the East River and watch the Knickerbocker yachtsmen sail their boats. He wished he had a sailboat. He believed he saw various channels in which one would be useful, and his brother Duff expressed the same sentiments. With due deliberation, therefore, they commenced forthwith to save up money and to look about for a yacht whose price should be within their means. Montagew was acquainted with a young medical student named Diem, who was already beginning to be called doctor among his associates. This doctor had been to sea one voyage and knew how to manage a yacht. He volunteered the offer, if Montagew Hardicooper would buy a boat, he would teach him to navigate her.

Soon Montagew, inquiring around, got wind of a little sailboat over in Jersey City which the owner was willing to part with for a moderate sum. Through a friend, in whose judgment he had much confidence, Montagew closed the bargain for the boat without having seen her. This was in the fall of the year, about the first of November. Some two weeks later, having saved and borrowed enough money to pay for their boat, Montagew and Duff decided to fetch her to New York. It was a rainy day. The doctor was ready to undertake to navigate the craft, and several persons were willing to go over to Jersey City and act as passengers on the way back. In this capacity the services of two adventurous youths, named Salvinny Boots and James Fulljames, were accepted. Together they set out for New Jersey.

The owner of the boat was easily found. He was a butcher who had once been an oysterman, and who was believed to hav seen a sea serpent. He had many words of praise for the boat. Her name was Sadie. She had been in a regatta the year before, the man said, and was second in the race at the finish. When questioned as to the number of boats taking part in the regatta, he said he had most forgot, but believed there were two—the Sadie and another boat. The Sadie was thereupon purchased by the enthusiastic Hardicoopers, and the price, $40, paid into the hands of the retired oysterman, who, with his cleaver, cut a page from his cash book, and, by a long and laborious process, transformed it into a document reading as follows:

"Jersey City, Nov. 15th.

"Reseaved this day of Montagew Hardicooper forty dollers for my 16 foot cat bote Sadie, in full payment theroff. The undersined P. Backstay."

Pocketing this instrument, Montagew Hardicooper and party went in search of the boat. They found her lying bottom-side up on the muddy bank of the Morris & Essex Canal, with the word Sadie painted in gilt letters on a blue board running athwart her stern. By a united effort she was turned over. Criticisms were then in order.

"Gee, gosh! what a racket!" shouted Salvinny Boots, and he danced wildly.

"Hooray!" volunteered Duff.

James Fulljames remarked that she was "a daisy."

"Waw-hoop!" yelled Montagew Hardicooper, for he was in high spirits.

The Sadie was all his fancy painted her. She was bright as a new dollar, and sound from stem to stern. Not a seam was started. The rowlocks, and every screw and nail, were of copper. She had been built upon honor.

Off to the west, about one-fourth of a mile, flowed the Hackensack River. Close at hand on the east was the canal. In this the Sadie must be launched and locked through from the canal to the river. The lock was half a mile away up stream. It fell to Duff and Fulljames to propel the craft, by means of sweeps and otherwise, to the lock, from thence to the river, and down the river to a point opposit where she now lay, to which point Montagew, Salvinny, and the doctor would transport the rigging overland. The difficulty James and Duff had getting her up the canal and down the river against the wind and tide was immense. James wanted to tow the boat along by means of a rope, Duff remaining aboard and "keeping her off" with an oar. The rope was so short, and Duff exerted such vigor in pushing away from the bank, that he once or twice pulled James into the canal, and filled his boots with water.

After a good deal of trouble the Sadie was worked around to where Montagew and the others were waiting with the sails and spars. These latter had been found in good condition. The mast was a handsome stick, straight as a gun-barrel; the boom and gaff were in first-class order, and there were as many sister-hooks, and grummets, and gilguys scattered about as would serve to rig two such boats. The sail was spread out upon the ground, and in that position the doctor bent it to the spars and rove the halliards. The rest stood around watching him and getting in his way, bewildered among so many lines and loops and eyelets that they could not divine the use of. Finally, the rigging was carried aboard. The Hardicoopers were in a state of mind bordering on delirium. They were the proprietors of a boat that was rapidly becoming a small ship.

"All aboard," shouted the doctor.

The boys tumbled into the boat.

"Stand by the halliards," and Doctor Diem passed one line to Montagew and another to Duff.

"Aye, aye," they responded. They were fast becoming sailors.

"Haul away smartly!"

Up went the sail. Then they belayed the ropes as they were and dropped the centerboard; the doctor seated himself by the tiller; the big sail flapped for a moment, then swung to one side and puffed out like a boy's cheek when he is whistling. There was a tinkling ripple under the bow of the Sadie; the shore seemed to be moving away—and the Hardicoopers were afloat. Talk about the pride of a boy when he gets his first pair of boots; the happiness of a dog with two tails; the ecstasy of a youngster with a red wagon—these are griefs compared with the transports of the Hardicoopers. They swung their hats; they stood up and shook hands; they shouted with glee till the waves of the Hackensack rippled in response.

There is something about riding in a sailboat that is different from riding in anything else. You are neither drawn nor pushed. It must be good deal like ballooning. You hav not the jigger and jar of the steamboat, nor the man in his shirtsleeves that goes with the rowboat. Some invisible power touches the sail, and the boat moves. There is the element of air above and the element of water below; and the passenger is, so to speak, sandwiched between.

After the Hardicoopers' first paroxysm of delight had passed, they stretched themselvs in the thwarts and settled down to solid happiness. Everything was quiet, and a mist floated upon the surface of the river. Soon James and Salvinny and the doctor piped up and sang a song of the rolling deep. The Hardicoopers never sang, but had great capacities for listening, and were not critical. They therefore enjoyed such music as the trio were able to afford. As the old rhyme has it,

Fair laughs the morn and soft the zephyr blows,
While, proudly gliding o'er the azure realm,
In gilded trim the gallant Sadie goes,
Youth at the prow, and Pleasure at the helm.

So down the stream the party passed, singing and listening, drifting and rocking; happy, careless, contented.

But they were not to reach home without adventure. Salvinny Boots was one of those youths who do not know when they are well off. There was room enough on the seats of the Sadie, but he thought it would be the proper thing to sit on the little strip of deck that ran around the boat. So he sat there and swung his feet. The result was what everybody looked for. His feet suddenly flew upward, and he took a backward plunge into the river. But he had hardly struck the water before Montagew Hardicooper had him by the heel, and he was being yanked along in the wake of the Sadie. Montagew got a grip with his left hand on the shoulder of Salvinny and dragged him half way into the boat; then his right hand fell with a loud slap on the seat of Salvinny's trousers, and the youth was tumbled heels over head into the boat. The doctor turned the Sadie about and picked up Salvinny's hat, and jammed it, filled with water, upon the owner's head. As for Boots, a good deal of the hilarity was taken out of him, and he spent the next half hour in wringing the water out of his clothes. Duff loaned him his overcoat, and both sat and shivered.

While all these things were occurring the day was drawing to a close. The voyagers had now reached Bergen Point, near the mouth of the river, and Staten Island was close ahead. They could just see its lights through the fog, which was growing more dense every moment. At Staten Island they expected to get something to eat, and made a landing for that purpose. Here Salvinny danced about so in his efforts to keep warm that he fell under the suspicion of being insane, and came near getting arrested. The boys visited a grocery store and made a good meal on crackers and cheese, and then returned to the boat. The fog had now become so thick that they could hardly see one another's forms. There was no breeze, and the men on the wharf convinced them that it would be impossible to reach New York with the Sadie that night. They might leave the boat there and go home on the ferry. The ferry had stopped running from that point, but by going overland to the quarantine on the other side of the island, they might be able to catch a boat. A horsecar would take them to quarantine. Into a car the four lads climbed, and Salvinny Boots came shivering after. At the end of a dreary ride of about five miles they reached quarantine. There they learned that no more boats would go to New York that night on account of the fog.

"Gee, gosh, what a racket!" shouted Salvinny. That was what Salvinny said on every occasion.

"Steady there," said the doctor, speaking nautically, "hav you got any money?"

The boys drew together to take an account of resources. Montagew searched his pockets and produced $1.10; Duff scraped together $0.27. James, with a look of deep concern upon his face, elevated his elbow, thrust his hand deep into the inside pocket of his vest, and, after a long search, drew forth $0.00. The doctor had ten cents. Salvinny said he must hav lost all his money when he fell overboard! Total, $1.47. This would pay for the lodging of one. Montagew would not desert his shipmates, and there was nothing to do but to make a night of it in the ferry-house. In the waiting room was a big stove. Salvinny drew up to this and was soon converted into a cloud of steam from his wet clothes. The others wandered dismally about, catching short naps occasionally by lying upon the benches, and awaking with an ache in every bone.

It must hav been well along toward midnight. The boys were standing in front of the ferry-house. It rained a little, but they had got accustomed to that, and Salvinny knew he couldn't get any wetter than he was already. Suddenly they saw a white figure turn around the corner and come toward them.

"Look! boys," whispered the doctor; "what is that?"

"It's a kid," said James; "in her night dress."

"A kid" was what James always called a child until, years afterward, he had one of his own.

And so it turned out to be a little girl, barefooted, bareheaded, and with nothing between her and the rain but the gown she was accustomed to sleep in. She was crying.

"Please, sir," she said, addressing no one in particular; "can you tell me where to find a policeman?"

James had a big rubber coat on, which made him look almost like a man. He stepped forward, threw out his chest, and, twirling his umbrella with a proper flourish, said in a deep-sea voice: "I am an officer; what can I do for you, little gyurl?"

"Me fader is drunk," said the child, "and he's clubbin' me mudder."

Here was a chance for the boys to distinguish themselvs. They would fly to the rescue of helpless womanhood. The keeper of the ferry-house said he knew the girl's father. He was a bad man, and would as soon shoot anybody as not. But the boys were foolhardy if not courageous. They told the child to go ahead and show them the house. The girl in the night-gown ran up the street; James and Duff stumped along close to her heels, and Montagew and the doctor kept at a respectful distance behind. Salvinny stuttered through his jiggering teeth, "Gee, gosh, what a racket!" and dived into the ferry-house and rubbed up against the stove.

The house was soon sighted. The volunteer policemen took up their position on the opposit side of the street, sending the girl ahead to reconnoiter. Presently the window opened and they heard the sound of groans and the thud of blows. These ceased and they waited in suspense, expecting to see the child's body flung out of the window, accompanied by the blaze of firearms directed at themselvs. It appeared to be a critical moment. The child was seen at the window, and they heard her voice raised, "Hey, mister," she said, "you needn't come in. It's all right. Mudder's got the best of the old man, and is bastin' him wid a broomstick."

The boys returned to the ferry, Montagew and the doctor this time taking the lead.

The night wore away with songs and jokes about their adventures, and in the morning they took the earliest boat for New York.

A few days later Montagew and the doctor sailed the Sadie up the East River to the Harlem. It was too late in the season for extensiv yachting that year, but when the spring opened Montagew Hardicooper joined the Knickerbocker Yacht Club, and became one of its most activ members. The exercise agreed with him, and he got fat, and his cough left him. He took on sailor ways and left off his suspenders, hitching up his trousers by grasping them fore and aft; and when autumn came again you would never hav recognized in the rugged and sunburnt sailorfied chap, the pallid youth described in the opening of this account. He sailed the Sadie in numerous regattas, and was always beaten, but that did not dim the ardor of his enthusiasm. She was not built for a racer, he said, but she was as "stiff as a church;" by which he meant to say that she was not easily overturned; though once she capsized in a flaw of wind, and left him swimming in the salt water until a passing steamer picked him up and righted the boat for him.

Duff did not take as much interest in yachting as Montagew. While its effect on his brother's health is very gratifying to him, he is still inclined at times to look upon the subject lightly. One day he wrote this bit of verse, which was printed in the New York Judge:

THE KNICKERBOCKER YACHTSMAN.

When prosperous breezes blow athwart the Sound
The sunburnt yachtsman spreads his snowy sail,

And as his anchor slowly breaks its ground,

No Admiral Seymour, with his armored fleet,
Upon his shoulders feels a heavier weight
Than does your yachtsman on his catboat seat.

Aloft a glance, with youthful wisdom fraught,
He throws on mast and vane and gaff and leech;
Names points superior about his yacht,
And puzzles you with his seafaring speech.

He jibes and tacks, and brings his craft about;
He yaws and luffs, and puts his tiller down,
Hauls in the sheet or lets it further out,
Rolls up his sleeves to let his arms grow brown.

He yachts and yachts, acquiring health and tan,
And sea terms adding to his sailor lore;
He sails his boat for every inch he can—
For all she's worth—and sometimes even more.

The Sadie is getting old, and lies bottom upwards for the winter on the shore near Port Morris. Montagew has not sailed her this summer. His proficiency as a sailor has become a passport for him to larger yachts in the club, and his first love is forgotten; but, afloat or ashore, Duff will always hav for the Sadie a tender regard, and when she finally goes to pieces he will try and save some little fragment of the wreck as a memento of an event, as he believes, so closely connected with his immediate and future happiness.

DOUBLE ACROSTIC.

Dedicated to all my Friends.

Ye puzzlers all, just list to me,
To what I hav to say;
'Tis only this, as you will see—
A double acrostic, this little lay,
Whose primals, when read down,
Will name a city, now quite old;
And finals—now don't begin to frown—
A plant will name, so I am told.
But halt! the best of it is yet to come:
The primals and finals connected name
A plant. I am about now done;
Now go ahead and solve the same.

1. For this you find an animal
That burrows in the ground.
2. Next you hav a festival
Comes but once a year around.
3. A fortification here is seen;
'Tis of polygonal form.
4. A biographical name does mean;
To own it is no harm.
5. A plant is next, of genus rhus;
For different things 'tis used.
6. With him "I came down in the 'bus;"
He all the passengers amused.
7. A genus of mollusks we hav next,
Including the cuttle-fish.
8. To engage, enlist, or to invest,
Whichever you may wish.
9. The last, to cloud, also to stain.
Now for me the answer rightly tell.
Your labor shall not be in vain;
Each solver I'll giv "Puzzledom in a Nutshell."

CROSSWORD.

In friend, not in send;
In drink, not in think;
In earth, not in birth;
In admire, not in attire;
In sew, not in low;
In rain, not in pain;
In time, not in rhyme:
In decay, not in delay;
In kite, not in sight;
In dance, not in trance;
In otter, not in water;
In you, not in few;
In glass, not in lass;
In love, not in dove;
In said, not in bed;
In stock, not in flock;
In show, not in hoe.

My whole is the name of a colored man who was much esteemed by Abraham Lincoln.

Correspondence.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Nov. 8, 1884.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Madam: Your kind notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 1st flatters me rather more than I expected. Thanks; and to my young and old friends I would kindly advise—especially the former—that as patience and perseverance conquer all things, the Mystic (Puzzle) Art can be learned by all, also.

To my friend Bernheim let me say, when making anagrams, that he should put in the quotation marks, or readers may think the whole verse is an anagram, as in his puzzle of Nov. 1st.

To "Uncle James's" "Literal Discouragement" (?), call a puzzle by its plain name, as No. 2 in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 8th, which is simply a transposition.

And last, my friend Baker—his rhythmic efforts are very well, yet he to name them as puzzles appears to be at loss; but I suppose in the respect to puzzling he stands with Shakspere, who asks, "What's in a name?"

However, I will not scold them all. Their further efforts are welcomed; and especially the writer takes great interest in seeing your Corner made the means of educating all, and hopes ere long you will hav a goodly number of contributors.

I send you herein solutions and contributions, in hopes they will prove acceptable.

I remain, respectfully,
H. E. JUERGENS.

IRWIN, IOWA, Nov. 4, 1884.

MISS WIXON: I would like very much to express to Esprit Fort my high appreciation of the excellence of his Paradox in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct 25th. It is one of the best, if not entirely the best, that has yet appeared in our Corner. It remains to be seen if he can repeat such merit often. I can find only one word to criticise, that is "way above my reach." I would change way to quite, or just, or "My bed it is above my reach, etc." I ought to tell you what the answer is, a "pair of bob-sleds."

I do not think that the more difficult of solution a puzzle is, the better it is. I hav not time, on the spur of the moment, to name what I consider the chief points of excellence in a puzzle. If I had Esprit Fort's address I would venture a little "note of admiration" to him. If you write him, please say I would like to form his acquaintance. Whenever you hav anything as good as his Paradox, please let me stand aside for him. Yours truly, J. K. P. BAKER.

Poetry.

The Way It Is Said.

The sultan awoke with a stifled scream;
His nerves were shocked by a fea ful dream.

An omen of terrible import and doubt—
His teeth in one moment all fell out.

And stood by the throne in solemn array,

And when the terrible dream was told,
Each felt a shudder, his blood ran cold;

And all stood silent, in fear and dread,
And wondering what was best to be said.

At length an old soothsayer, wrinkled and gray,
Cried, "Pardon, my lord, what I hav to say;

"'Tis an omen of sorrow sent from on high;
Thou shalt see all thy kindred die."

Wroth was the sultan; he gnashed his teeth,
And his very words seemed to hiss and seethe

As he ordered the wise man bound with chains,
And gave him a hundred stripes for his pains.

The wise men shook as the sultan's eye
Swept round to see who next would try;

But one of them, stepping before the throne,
Exclaimed, in a loud and joyous tone:

"Exult, O head of a happy state!
Rejoice, O heir of a glorious fate!

"For this is the favor thou shalt win,
O Sultan, to outliv all thy kin!"

Pleased was the sultan, and called a slave,
And a hundred crowns to the wise man gave.

But the courtiers, they nod, with grave, sly winks,
And each one whispers what each one thinks,

"Well can the sultan reward and blame;
Didn't both the wise men foretell the same?"

Quoth the crafty old vizier, shaking his head,
"So much may depend on the way a thing's said!"

Mrs. H. S. Lake.

DEAR READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: It has been a long time since I communicated with you, yet you are by no means forgotten; nor hav I ceased to take interest in the grand Liberal movement, of which you form so important a part.

I could not attend the League Congress, my engagements were such, but I note, with much satisfaction, that the result of the Convention seems to be renewed activity and increased interest. This is gratifying to me, and I shall co-operate whenever it is possible.

After attending the camp-meetings, we came to this place, to fill an engagement with the Liberal Society, for which we spoke four months last winter.

We found it in a prosperous condition, and, notwithstanding the political campaign, the interest continues to increase. We giv two lectures each Sunday. We hav a very fine choir, under Mr. Peck's leadership. Our Socials are largely attended, and I think it can truthfully be said that the Liberal Society exerts as much influence upon this community as any church. We hav some very activ, intelligent, and enthusiastic members. It would be almost unjust to name any particularly, all are so zealous. The hall is prettily decorated, and all who enter it feel a spirit of fraternity, which attracts them again. The membership is made up of both Materialists and Spiritualists, and the utmost harmony prevails.

For myself, as most of you know, I am a pronounced Spiritualist, and do all of my public work under the influence of my spirit friends; yet I number many of my warmest supporters and friends among Materialists. They take the position that they are simply "waiting for the light."

Of course Mr. Chainey's conversion is commented on here, as elsewhere. All Spiritualists feel glad that he has been convinced, and that he is brave enough to say so; though all do not, perhaps, quite agree with his methods.

Mrs. Slenker's pilgrimage is watched with interest, and it is hoped she may obtain truth in her investigations. Yet, whatever her conclusions may be, the great fact—accepted by millions—of spirit communion will remain the same.

I cannot close this brief letter without referring to the present political outlook in this particular locality. In this state the Democrats and People's Party hav united, much to the dissatisfaction of the Republicans. Gen. Weaver, the Greenback candidate for Congress, from the sixth district, is creating the greatest enthusiasm. Crowds of delighted listeners applaud his incontrovertible statements, and he will, no doubt, be elected. He is one of the ablest political speakers in the United States, and as an intelligent and honorable man he will be, as he has been, an honor to our National Congress. Reform in politics, as in religion, is the inevitable tendency of the age.

A most gratifying feature of this political canvass is the fact that many of the audiences in attendance number about one-half women; their education, in the affairs of government, is thus being brought about, and the day is not far distant when woman will be an activ element in politics in every state of the Union. It is but seldom that I meet a so-called Liberal who is opposed to the enfranchisment of my sex. In this, as in all other questions which pertain to the welfare of the race, we hav an abiding interest.

THE TRUTH SEEKER does not fail to take its position on the right side, and, with its able contributors, it grows better every day. For truth and justice, Yours, MRS. H. S. LAKE.

Ottumwa, Iowa, Oct. 25. 284.

"Waifs and Wanderings."

This bright and pleasing novel is one of S. P. Putnam's latest works, and is written in the author's well-known vigorous and entertaining style. You cannot help reading after you once begin it, for it draws you irresistibly along to the end. You cannot help laughing at some of the comical situations of Cupples, and crying over the trials of Amy, a white slave, yet with as sweet, pure, and noble impulses as ever made true womanhood beautiful and glorious. The story reads like history, in fact it is history, and depicts slavery as upheld by "divine" and state laws, and shows, also, some of the terrible features of the Rebellion in vivid word pictures. Bits of precious philosophy are woven in with the narrativ, like threads of fine gold, and the whole is well spiced with anecdote and epigram.

Great truths and useful lessons are often conveyed to the mind by means of the novel, and Mr. Putnam, in "Waifs and Wanderings," as well as in his previous works, has flashed many a philosophic fact, many a scientific guide mark to paths of reason and common sense along the way that travelers must go while on their journey through the world.

If you hav not yet read this book, you should lose no time in procuring a copy, for it is as I hav told you, and is deserving of a wide circulation.

It is a somewhat common remark that libraries in Liberal homes are filled more with what is termed heavy reading than with lighter works. There should be a fair sprinkling of the latter in order to preserve a healthy balance, especially when of the wholesome, breezy, interesting character of "Waifs and Wanderings." SUSAN H. WIXON.

"WAIFS AND WANDERINGS."

MR. EDITOR: Will you please allow me a little space to state that the above-named book, by our secretary, Samuel P. Putnam, should be read by all, both Infidels and others? It is grand, and the writer must hav been a soldier in the late "big fuss." I would especially request veterans to read it. Why, from the first chapter to the last it is almost out of the question to stop reading.

Billy Stubbs, afterward General Stubbs, is very original. He says, "There is a destiny that shapes our ends rough; hew them as we may." The death of the faithful negro, Columbus, is beyond describing. Read it, friends, read it. REMLY S. SIDELINGER.

Boston, Nov. 7, A.S. 284.

A Contemptible Pretext

Is ended by Cleveland's election. Let us hope never to hear it again. There livs not to-day a man of the strong, fierce, Southern Democratic spirit of Andrew Johnson Those of his school who survive hav been changed by the changing times. Except in being a Union man, he was the most ultra Southern Democrat of his age. And yet he took the executiv chair almost before the end of the war. Slaves were held in several states; no state had yet emancipated; the South was full of discharged soldiers and desperadoes; no black man had the franchise; all things were unsettled. And yet, twenty years after, when all the old rebels are dead or superannuated, all slaves freed, all blacks enfranchised, a new people rule the South to whom the word secession is meaningless, with the North infinitly stronger, and Northern spirit pervading the whole South, we are told it is "dangerous to elect a Northern Democrat to the presidency; it is a surrender to the South!" Surely, if we passed safely twenty ago under Andrew Johnson, why fear to-day? This dread of the South is not creditable, while this mean distrust of a vanquished enemy is contemptible. Freethinker's Magazine.

PROSPECTUS FOR VOLUME III.

We propose to greatly increase the value of this publication for the coming year, and, notwithstanding, keep the price the same, $1.50 per year, and 25 cents for a single number.

The communication or article department will be printed with large type, long primer, the same kind used by the Popular Science Monthly. We shall publish articles in this department from the ablest writers in the Freethought ranks. The "All Sorts" department will be published with brevier type in two column pages, and we shall labor to make this department valuable and interesting. The "Extract-from-Letters" Department will be printed as heretofore. Here will be found all the interesting and pithy sayings of our corresponding friends. Then we shall add a "Book Review" department, in which we shall notice new books as they make their appearance.

THE DIRECTORY.

For the purpose of having more space for reading matter, we shall republish our long list of names but twice during the year—in the May and September numbers. But in each number of the Magazine we shall publish all the names we receive subsequent to the previous number, and all of these will be transferred to the Directory when that is published. Each person who sends in his or her name and post-office address for the DIRECTORY with twenty-five cents, will receive the number containing the name free. Now, kind reader, before you sleep, will you forward to us $1.50 for Volume III. of this publication?

The Freethinkers' Association, Its Convention—The Supreme Being, by Courtlandt Palmer.—Men, Women, and Gods, by Helen H. Gardner.—Anti-Prohibition, by W. S. Bell.—The Coming Religious Demands, by Samuel P. Putnam.—The New Republic, by Juliet H Severance.—Blessed Are the Pure in Liver, by J. H Burnham.—Contrast Between Science and Religion, by T. L. Brown, M.D.—Salvation, by Charles B. Reynolds.—Spiritualism, by Dr. W. F. McCormick.—Charles Watts's Speech, Editor's Report.—Emancipation, by Samuel Hubert Wells.—Absurdities, Their Origin and Propagation, by Mary A. White.—Obituary Address, by Solon K. Thurston.—National Liberal League.—All Sorts, Editorial Notes.—Freethought Directory.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

1857. SECOND GRAND ANNUAL 1885.

New Years Gift Presentation,

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE 28TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE

ROCHELLE JEWELRY STORE.

January 1, 1885,

At 2 P.M., ROCHELLE, ILL.

Last year on New Year's day Wettstein presented to his patrons assembled in Armory Hall, a valuable collection of beautiful presents, comprising 10 Gold Watches and Gold Chains; half a dozen genuin Diamond Pins, Rings, and Eardrops; over a dozen fine Silver Watches, solid Gold Jewelry, elegant Silverware, Fancy Goods, etc., ranging in price from $1.00 to $100 00.

This I propose to do this year and to giv my Liberal friends abroad an opportunity to receive a nice present.

The aggregate of goods presented will not be less than $1,500, and probably $2,000, according to amount of goods sold.

To all my customers sending $1.00 or more for goods or work, I shall present, for each and every dollar, a certificate entitling the owner to one or more shares in these gifts.

This is the fairest and most liberal offer ever made by any merchant in America. My stock is complete in everything pertaining to a first-class jewelry store; prices now averaging 25 per cent below those of largest cities; goods sent by mail or express to all parts of the world accompanied by one certificate for every dollar remitted, and cash refunded if not satisfactory, and returned same day received.

Prices on watches again reduced since last price list in this paper. The presents will be presented in a public hall of Rochelle, directly to my customers, or to a committee selected by them at that time, in one entire lot, and the mode of distribution will be optional with them.

Everybody pleased last year, and all must be pleased this year.

Circulars giving all particulars and describing style and value of each gift, mailed free on application. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but now is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

DESPISE the man governed by envy and malice and hatred, to cover which he boasts of his own goodness, and says, I am better than thou. Honor not the man who seeks to build himself up by pulling another down. Honor not the hypocrit and the liar. Despise the man who makes himself busy in digging up the faults and mistakes of his brother, which hav been buried and forgotten, to spread them before the world, and to shout to all men, saying, See what a bad man is here; trust him not; patronize him not; withdraw your friendship from him.—D. M. Bennett.

A DEFINITION.—Pantarchy, a conspiracy to help everybody to do what they want to; with organized efficiency given to the influences which will induce them to want the best; Guided Spontaneity, directed to the highest ends.—The Pantarch.

AND here I take occasion to thank Mr. Black for having admitted that Jehovah gave no commandment against the practice of polygamy, that he established slavery, waged wars of extermination, and persecuted for opinion's sake even unto death. Most theologians endeavor to putty, patch, and paint the wretched record of inspired crime, but Mr. Black has been bold enough and honest enough to admit the truth. In this age of fact and demonstration it is refreshing to find a man who believes so thoroughly in the monstrous and miraculous, the impossible and immoral; who still clings lovingly to the legends of the bib and rattle; who through the bitter experiences of a wicked world has kept the credulity of the cradle, and finds comfort and joy in thinking about the Garden of Eden, the subtle serpent, the flood, and Babel's tower, stopped by the jargon of a thousand tongues; who reads with happy eyes the story of the burning brimstone storm that fell upon the cities of the plain, and smilingly explains the transformation of the retrospectiv Mrs. Lot; who laughs at Egypt's plagues and Pharaoh's whelmed and drowning hosts; eats manna with the wandering Jews, warms himself at the burning bush, sees Korah's company by the hungry earth devoured, claps his wrinkled hands with glee above the heathens' butchered babes, and longingly looks back to the patriarchal days of concubines and slaves. How touching when the learned and wise crawl back in cribs and ask to hear the rhymes and fables once again! How charming in these hard and scientific times to see old age in Superstition's lap, with eager lips upon her withered breast?—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

THE Middle Ages were more religious than ours in proportion to their greater ignorance and barbarism; and, at present, the same difference exists, for example, between Spain and Germany, or, in Germany, between Tyrol and Saxony. Religion and civilization accordingly occupy, not an equal, but an inverted position in regard to each other, so that with the progress of the latter the former retreats.—Strauss's Old and New Faith.

THE cure for the greatest part of human miseries is not radical but palliativ. Infelicity is involved in corporeal nature and interwoven with our being; all attempts, therefore, to decline it wholly are useless and vain; the armies of pain send their arrows against us on every side; the choice is only between those which are more or less sharp, or tinged with poison of greater or less malignity; and the strongest armor which reason can supply will only blunt their points, but cannot repel them. The great remedy which heaven has put in our hands is patience, by which, though we cannot lessen the torments of the body, we can in a great measure preserve the peace of the mind, and shall suffer only the natural and genuin force of an evil, without hightening its acrimony or prolonging its effects.—Dr. Johnson's Rambler.

I HAV now pitched my tent under a cypress-tree; the tomb is now my inexpugnable fortress, ever close to the gate of which I look upon the hostil armaments and pains and penalties of tyrannous life placidly enough, and listen to its loudest threatening with a still smile. O ye loved ones, that already sleep in the noiseless land of rest, whom in life I could only weep for and never help; and ye who wide-scattered still toil lonely in the monster-bearing desert, dyeing the flinty ground with your blood—yet a little while and we shall all meet there and our mother's bosom will screen us all; and oppression's harness and sorrow's fire-whip and all the Gehenna bailiffs that patrol and inhabit ever-vexed time, cannot thenceforth harm us any more.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

A TRAVELER over the Alps, with his companion, was overtaken by a storm. His companion, who was weaker than he, succumbed to the biting wind and the pelting snow and lay down to die. The other felt a faintness creeping into his own heart; but rousing himself with great effort, he began to rub into life his dying friend. In the stress of his labor he forgot the wind and the rain and the snow; his own blood began to tingle in his veins, his courage and energy returned as he toiled over his prostrate friend, welcoming every sign of recovering life. He became a man again; he lifted his friend from the ground, and the two fared on the way together until they reached a hospice, where they found shelter.—Frothingham's Consolations of Rationalism.

CAN two walk together except they be agreed? (Amos iii, 3.) Two are better than one, because they hav a good reward for their labor. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow; but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up. Again, if two lie together, then they hav heat; but how can one be warm alone? And if one prevail against him, how shall he withstand him? and a threefold cord is not quickly broken.—Ecclesiastes iv, 9-12.

CERTAINLY great persons had need to borrow other men's opinions to think themselvs happy; for if they judge by their own feeling, they cannot find it; but if they think with themselvs what other men think of them, and that other men would fain be as they are, then they are happy as it were by report, when perhaps they find the contrary within; for they are the first that find their own griefs, though they are the last that find their own faults.—Bacon's Essays.

AS the cold weather is coming on, farmers will begin to think about housing their cattle. Those who hav steers to shed should prepare to shed them now.

SAID a young man to a professor of chemistry, at the same time holding up a fungus-looking plant: "Is there any way by which I can positivly tell whether this is a mushroom or a toadstool?" "Yes," answered the professor. "Eat it. If it is a mushroom, you'll liv; if it's a toadstool, you'll die."

MRS. BLINKS.—I notice by the papers that the hot water craze has revived. Mrs. Rinks.—What is that? "Why, don't you know? Everybody is drinking hot water in large quantities." "But what for?" "For their health. Hot water is said to be wonderfully wholesome." "Isn't that splendid! We can call our oyster festivals this winter 'health exhibitions.'"

A LITTLE ROCK man sold his cooking stove to get money enough to take his family to the circus. When one of his friends remonstrated with him, he said: "We had no use for the stove. Had nothing to cook." "But why didn't you buy something to eat with the money you got for the stove?" "Then we should hav had nothing to cook it on. Don't talk to me. I'm a philosopher."

A VERMONT farmer's boy has bought himself a bicycle, and wishes he hadn't. His father has utilized the thing by making it furnish motiv power for his winnowing mill, corn-sheller, and grindstone. This he does by suspending it from the axle, removing the tire from the wheel, and connecting it by an endless rope with his agricultural machines, then making his son mount and do the propelling.

"MY dear," said a wife to her husband, "I know that I am dreadfully cross with you at times, that I am not patient as I should be, and I think the same can be said of you." "Yes, certainly," he frankly acknowledged, "I am almost as bad as you are." "What's that?" "I—I say that I am just as much to blame as you are." "I think," went on the lady, "that we ought to cultivate a mutual toleration of each other's faults," and she bent over him and fondly kissed him. "You are not looking well tonight, my dear," he said, stroking her hair. "No," she replied, "my feet pain me dreadfully." "That's because you wear shoes two sizes too small for you." Then the trouble began once more.

"COME in," said the fourth-floor lawyer as the boy rapped on the door. "Say, mister!" "Well?" "Are you going to burn coal this winter?" "I may." "Then you'll hav to buy some," "Perhaps." "And you'll hav to hav it carried up." "Shouldn't wonder." "And I'd like the job." The lawyer locked his hands back of his head, and looked out of the window for a long time without a word in reply. The boy put in his time looking around the room, and when the silence had become painful he said: "Well, good-bye. If you get a case this fall, and get any money, and buy any coal, and don't want to carry it up yourself after dark, I'd like the job. You can remember I'm the boy who spoke to you. I've got red hair and two boils on my leg, and I feel awful sorry for poor folks."

A MAN, seemingly about sixty years of age, was telling the people in the waiting-rooms at the Third street depot, yesterday, that he had been east to old Massachusetts to see his sisters, and that on the way back he stopped off at Niagara Falls. "That's a place I never saw," remarked a woman with a poke bonnet on. "You didn't! Well, you've missed the awfullest sight on earth. I was jest stunned." "What is it like?" she asked. "Well, there's a river, and the falls, and lots of hotels, and several Injuns, and the bridal veil, and land only knows what else. If my old woman had a-been along, she'd hav wilted right down." "There's water there, I suppose?" "Oh, heaps of it. It pours and thunders and roars and foams and humps around in the terriblest manner. You hav bit on a shirt-button in a piece of pie, havn't you?" "No, sir." "Well, the feeling was about the same—kinder shivery. Why, the biggest man that ever lived ain't half as big as Niagara Falls. Let him set thar, and see that 'ere water tumbling over them 'ere rocks, and he can't help but feel what a miserable hoss-fly he is. You've falled out o' bed havn't you?" "No, sir." "Well, it's about the same thing. You wake up and find yourself on the floor, and you feel as if you had been stealin' sheep or robbin' blind men." "What portion of the Falls did you most admire?" "The water, mum," he promptly replied. "If you'd put 10,000 kegs of beer on the roof of this building, and set them all running, they couldn't begin with Niagara. It's the terriblest, appallingest thing ever patented." "Cost you much?" inquired a gentleman. "'Bout sixty-five cents. It's pooty tight times, and sixty-five cents don't grow on every bush, but I ain't sorry. It's sunthin' to talk about for twenty years to come. There's a chap in our town who used to travel with a circus, but he'll hav to take a back seat when I git home. Flip-floppin' around in a circus don't begin with Niagara Falls." "So, on the whole, you were pleased, eh?" "Pleased! Why, I was tickled half to death! I tell you if I had one on my farm, I wouldn't sell it for no $50 in cash. I've looked into a field whar 750 fat hogs was waitin' to be sold for solid money, but it was no sich sight as the Falls. I've seen barns afire, and eight hosses runnin' away, and the Wabash river on a tear, but for downright appalling grandeur of the terriblest kind, gimme one look at the Falls. You all ought to go thar. You can't half appreciate it till you've gazed on the rumpus."

Notes and Clippings.

THE Boy Preacher Harrison announces his determination to pass the few remaining days of the decline and fall off of his now venerable years in the quiet retirement of Chicago.

ON a Sunday night, after preaching a powerful sermon on hypocrisy, the Rev. James W. Lindsay committed a burglary at Rushville. Ind., as a result of which he has gone to prison.

IN the citadel at Quebec is shown a small cannon which was taken by the British at Bunker Hill. A party of Americans were looking at the gun the other day, while a sergeant recited the history of its capture. "Yes," said a lady, "you've got the cannon, but I guess we've got the hill."

A CHICAGO man wanted a divorce because his wife persisted in singing hymns. The court laughed at him, and he would hav lost his case had not the lawyer summoned the wife to the witness stand and started her singing. At the fifth verse the court threw up the sponge and the divorce was granted.

"EXPERIENCE may be a dear teacher," remarked a clergyman as the contribution-box was returned to him empty, "but the members of this particular flock who hav experienced religion hav accomplished it at a very trifling cost. The choir will sing the seventy-ninth hymn, omitting the first, third, and fourth verses, in order to save unnecessary wear on the organ."

NEXT January there is to be held in the city of Edinburgh, Scotland, a conference of artisans, capitalists, and persons interested in the study of social problems, to discuss from every point of view the questions connected with the distribution of the results of labor between the actual workers, and those supplying the capital. A "gentleman of Edinburgh" has given $5,000 toward carrying out the proposed program.

CARLYLE'S opinion of Daniel Webster was not as exalted as the opinion of the average American respecting the same character. Possibly the best words of the distinguished writer were exhausted in his "Reminiscences" of his father, who he thought was a greater Scotchman than Robort Burns. This is what Carlyle says of Webster: "I will warrant him one of the stiffest logic buffers and parliamentary athletes anywhere to be met with in our world at present—a grim, tall, broad-bottomed, yellow-skinned man, with brows like precipitous clifts, and huge, black, dull, wearied, yet unweariable-looking eyes under them; amorphous, projecting nose, and the angriest shut mouth I hav anywhere seen. A drop on the sides of the upper lip is quite mastiff-like—magnificent to look upon; it is so quiet withal. I guess I should like ill to be the man's nigger. However, he is a right clever man in his way, and has a husky sort of fun in him, too; drawls in a handfast, didactic manner about 'our republican institutions,' etc , and so plays his part."

THIS story about Colonel Ingersoll may not be true, but it has the merit of not involving a campaign lie. A correspondent of the Chicago News vouches for it: "President Clarke, of the Illinois Central Railroad, told me a good story about Bob Ingersoll, the other day, that has not yet been in print. A long time ago it was, when many counties in the southern part of the state were under township organizations, and the supervisors sat as judges in certain cases. 'Bob' was arguing a case before one of these tribunals, of which the judges were evidently more familiar with crops than law practice. He brought all his eloquence to bear on the point, that the case in question was a great injustice to his client, and should be 'thrown out of court.' Continually returning to that argument, he reached the climax with a burst that, as usual, carried everybody by storm, ending with the same appeal to 'throw it out of court, sirs! out of court.' It brought the judges up 'all standing,' and the presiding one slowly reached over, gathered up the papers in the case from the table in front of him, and as he gave them an energetic flip out of the window, turned to Ingersoll with a relieved smile, and said: 'Bob, she's out!'"

THE London World says: All friends who remember the condition of mental debility to which some years ago Professor Huxley was temporarily reduced by overstrain, will be relieved to know that the unsatisfactory state of health because of which Sir Andrew Clark has enforced on him a winter residence in Italy, is of a purely physical character. He and Mrs. Huxley left London on Friday last, bound by easy stages for northern Italy. Venice was the original selection as winter quarters, but I understand that Baveno has been ultimately chosen, both because of its more bracing climate, and because the facilities for exercise are better at Baveno than at Venice. Mr. and Mrs. Huxley look forward to be back in town for the marriage of their daughter next spring.

THIS is the way Robert Burdette, of the Burlington Hawkeye, dips into ancient history: A Christian martyr stood calmly in the arena, waiting for the guards to call the lion in to dinner, when Commodus, the emperor, touched with compassion, fitted an arrow to his gun, remarking to the prisoner that if he would just turn a little sideways he would put out both his eyes, so that he could not see the lion come in. "There is one eye, sir, about me," said the martyr, calmly, "that you can't shoot out—that will improve after I am dead." "And what is that eye, sir?" demanded the emperor, with lofty scorn. "Fertilizer," hoarsely replied the Christian martyr, holding his handkerchief over his face to conceal his emotion. A choking sob went murmuring all around that immense throng, like a dog trying to get into a smoke-house, and the dry sands of the arena were bathed in the tears of the Roman populace. Commodus was so confused that he swallowed the arrow he was fitting to the bow. The curtain was rung down, the lights turned up, and the next day that martyr appeared on the bills as "Engagement extraordinary—the leading American humorist, impersonator, and lightning change artist. First night of the Big 4."

A GREAT deal of newspaper and oral comment hav been occasioned by the omission of Gov. Hoadly to use the name of the deity in his Thanksgiving proclamation. A Columbus, O., Dispatch representativ interviewed his excellency on the subject recently. "What do you wish to know?" said the governor, smiling good-naturedly. "Anything you care to say," said the scribe. "Well," responded the governor, "I hav been greatly amused at the comments of some newspapers, but that is all. If you wish to know whether the omission was accidental or intentional, I will say that it was intentional. If you desire to know my reasons for omitting to mention the deity, I will tell you. I was reading the New Testament recently, and was thinking if Blaine should be elected what sort of a Thanksgiving proclamation I could issue. I found in the twenty-first verse of the seventh chapter of Matthew that which seems to convey the two principal characteristics of my proclamation, an intimation that it is not necessary to call upon the deity, and an exhortation to charity. The verse is as follows: 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my father which is in heaven.'"

ON the day after election the Bangor Whig contained the following: "Away off beyond the dead line of slavery are flaunting, in sullen defiance, the blood-stained banners of the shotgun and tissue ballot conspiracy of the solid South; under Northern stars and on patriotic ground I see again, high raised, the banners of Maine and Illinois, but now waving from the same flagstaff, while East and West the loyal legions rally in solid columns beneath the tattered battleflags of the Union, until the invincible banners of the loyal North lock their spear heads in a gleaming cordon around the homes of the Republican standard bearers of 1864; and then, as the sweet strains of victory float out upon the air when to-morrow's sun goes down, echoing and blending the patriotic strains of 'Yankee Doodle,' 'Hail Columbia,' 'Rally Round the Flag,' and 'Marching Through Georgia,' may we see God's own bow of promis shining out against the November sky, spanning with its arch of splendor from Katahdin to the Sierra Nevadas, from Aroostook to the Golden Gate, and bearing in jeweled brightness the names of the people's choice: 'Blaine and Logan.'" One of the saddest reflections called up by the result of the election is the thought that this beautiful flight of rhetoric was not justified by subsequently ascertained facts.

IN 1785, when Dr. Carroll, first bishop of Baltimore, submitted to the Roman Propaganda a report of the condition of the Catholic church in America, he was able to enumerate the churches by his fingers. There were but twenty-six priests, and the total number of Catholics was computed to be 25,000. To-day Colorado has a larger Catholic population. In 1808 there were in the United States 70 priests, 80 churches, and 150,000 Catholics, and since that time the growth of the church has been steady. The first Plenary Council was held in Baltimore in 1852. It was presided over by Archbishop Kendrick of Baltimore, and was attended by four archbishops, twenty bishops, and a greater number of lesser officials. At this time the Catholic population was slightly in excess of 3,500,000. Fourteen years later, in Baltimore, the second Plenary Council met, with the great archbishop of Baltimore, Martin John Spalding, presiding as apostolic delegate. In this council sat six archbishops and thirty-seven bishops. Meanwhile the church had been rapidly increasing in strength, and this council represented a Catholic population of 4,500,000. Since 1866 the church has continued to grow in a manner that is little short of the marvelous. The council which is now in session is composed of twelve archbishops, fifty-seven bishops, seventy-two procurators, mitred abbots, domestic priests of Pope Leo XIII., supervisors of theological seminaries and nearly a hundred priests of minor degrees. The Catholic population of the country is estimated to be over 9,000,000, and a number of Catholic writers claim 11,000,000. The ten churches of 1785 hav increased to over 6,600, and the number of priests is 6,835. The archdiocese of New York alone has a Catholic population of 600,000, that of Boston has nearly 350,000, that of Baltimore 220,000, that of Chicago over 250,000, that of Cincinnati 150,000, that of Philadelphia, which is now under the direction of the eloquent Archbishop Ryan, has over 300,000, and the other archdioceses in proportion. Great dioceses, like those of Brooklyn, Buffalo, Cleveland, Louisville, and Newark hav each a Catholic population ranging from 150,000 to 200,000. New York state alone has within its borders nearly 1,300,000 Catholics. In the far West the Catholic church has made the same progress. In Dakota they number 10,000, while the strongest Protestant sect in that section, the Lutheran, can boast of but 7,000 adherents. Montana contains 12,000 Catholics. The Methodists, who follow them in numerical strength, number about 3,000. In Oregon and California the same ratio can be found. The first has 20,000 Catholics and 5,000 Methodists; the second reports 216,000 Catholics and 12,000 Methodists, the next strongest sect. In Utah they number 2,000—vastly less than the Mormons, of course, but more than their chief rivals, the Methodists, of whom there are scarcely 500. In Idaho there are over 2,000 Catholics and about 500 Methodists; in Wyoming, Colorado, and Nevada the ratio is about the same. Throughout the West the Catholics form a solid, compact, and powerful body which is steadily growing in importance. In 1785, it may be added, when the population of the country was 3,500,000, and the Catholics numbered 25,000, this sect constituted about 1-140th of the total population. To-day, numbering, to speak within the bounds of truth, say 8,000,000, they constitute one-seventh of the total population. There are in this country, probably, some six or seven millions of that variety of humankind popularly known as "the scum of Europe." From these the Catholic church draws its numerical strength.

Antichrist.—Vol. II.—Peter and Paul.

PREFACE.

Although sufficient evidence was adduced in the appendix to the "Revelations of Antichrist" to establish the fact of the existence of Jesus and his apostles a hundred years before the time of Pontius Pilate, yet the work of "Antichrist" would hardly be complete without a critical examination of all the details, real and fabulous, of the lives of the two great apostles, Peter and Paul.*

In the prior volume the following leading facts were set forth and established with more or less certainty:

The name Jesus and the epithet Christ were familiar to the readers of the Septuagint, or Greek translation of the Old Testament, for more than two hundred years before the Christian era.

Iesous in Greek answers to Joshua in Hebrew and to Jeshu in the ancient vernacular of Palestine, meaning savior, and Christos is the Greek for Mashiach or Meshiha, meaning anointed.

The Gnostics, who flourished before the Christian era and culminated in the second century, had a divine Iesous and a Chreistos—the latter word not signifying anointed, but perhaps an early form of chrestos, "good," or possibly a derivativ from chreo (also chrei-o), Ionic for chrao, "to deliver an oracle."

Some of the Gnostic sects of the first and second centuries denied the existence of an objectiv Jesus.

The initial letters of the Sibylline Acrostic, which probably existed before the Christian era, were Iesous Chreistos Theou Uios Soter.

(Jesus Christ. God's Son. Savior).

And the further initials Stauros, "stake," or "cross," were added at an early date.

The writer of the epistles ascribed to John denounced Antichrist as a liar for denying that Jesus was the Christ, or that Christ had come in the flesh.

The first three evangelists fix the crucifixion on Friday the Great Passover day; the fourth gospel puts it on Friday the day before the Passover.

The apocryphal gospels, the Toldoth Jeshu legends, and the Talmud concur in fixing the execution of Jesus on the day before the Passover.

The Synoptic gospels are certainly wrong in placing the event on the Passover day, because the Jews never tried or executed a culprit on that holy day, nor was it ever allowed to fall on Friday.

The year of the birth of the gospel Jesus cannot be fixed, but if Herod the Great sought the life of the infant, then Jesus must hav been born at least four years before the Christian era, and was consequently over thirty-four years of age A.D. 29, when Luke says he was about thirty.

Nor has the year of the alleged crucifixion been determined. The only Passover Friday between A.D. 28 and 33 was in the year 30.

But Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian affirm that the crucifixion was in the year 29; and that is the year assigned in the recently discovered ancient Syriac documents.

There is no contemporary Jewish or heathen testimony to the existence of Jesus Christ in the first century. The passage quoted from Josephus by Eusebius is an admitted forgery; the references in the Talmud are conceded to be not to the gospel Jesus, but to one who was put to death a hundred years before; while the letters of Pliny and the Annals of Tacitus are proved to be forgeries.

Several recent Christian forgeries hav from time to time appeared in the newspapers, pretending to confirm the story of the crucifixion. One of these documents is an order by "Judge Pontius Pilate" for the execution of Jesus of Nazareth on "the 23d day of the Ides of March." The forger was not aware that the Ides were reckoned backward from April 1st, and that they numbered only seventeen. The 17th would be March 15; the next preceding eight days were called the Nones.

Another clumsy forgery is the "Death warrant of Jesus Christ," said to hav been discovered in Italy, engraved in Hebrew on a copper plate. Pontius Pilate is styled "acting governor of Lower Galilee;" he was governor of Judea only. The sentence is rendered in "the 17th year of Tiberius," which was A.D. 31, and on the 24th day of March," which is two days earlier than the Passover ever could hav occurred. Furthermore, March 24, A.D., 31, was the Sabbath, and three or four days before the full moon. Or if, as in the first version we saw of this canard, the day was March 27th (though probably a typographical error), then the crucifixion was not on Friday but Tuesday.

The name Petros is a Greek translation of the Aramaic or Syriac word Kepha, meaning rock or stone.

Paul mentions Kepha ten times in his Epistles; in the later Greek codices it is changed to Petros five times, in the earlier ones twice.

The ancient Syriac New Testament, called the Peshito, written in the vernacular of Palestine, is evidently a truer if not an older version than the Greek. In the four gospels and Acts it has Kepha seventy-nine times, and Simon (Shemeun) one hundred and thirty-five times, while the Greek version has Petros one hundred and fifty-six times, and Simon only fifty-three times.

The Peshito has, "Thou art Simon the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Kepha." To this the Greek scribe adds, "which means Petros." And to make the gloss more intelligible he interpolates Petros after the name Simon in a preceding verse.

A nativ Aramean, especially a Jew, could not hav been called Petros in his own country.

Paul doubtless wrote in Aramaic, and knew little or no Greek.

The early Christians were called by the Greeks Chrestians.

The name Christian, or Chrestian, was not known or acknowledged until about the middle of the second century.

Our four gospels, in the form they hav come down to us, cannot be traced back of the middle of the second century. The book of Acts is later.

Some of the apocryphal gospels and Acts of the Apostles appear to hav existed as early as the first century.

There are two apostles named James; and there is another James sometimes called the brother of the Lord. The latter James is the one mentioned by Paul as if he was an Apostle.

James, Kepha, and John are the only persons named in Paul's epistles who can be identified with any of the twelve apostles.

One other person is called an apostle by Paul, namely Epaphroditus.

Joseph describes the murder of one James, the brother of Jesus, in Jerusalem A.D. 62. Eusebius supposes this James to hav been the brother of the Lord and first bishop of Jerusalem. But the words in Josephus, "who was called Christ," are conceded to be an interpolation, and the identity of Josephus's James with the apostle or brother of Jesus Christ is denied by Christian scholars.

Hegissippus (A.D. 160–180) also describes the murder of James the Just, a believer in Jesus Christ, but it is impossible to identify the same with any James described in the gospels.

John the Revelator and John the Apostle are two very different characters.

There are traces of two Johns, both buried at Ephesus, living many years apart, and one of them called a Presbyter.

There were three high priests named Jesus between A.D. 4 and 69.

Barnabas and Paul are called apostles in the book of Acts; and yet it does not appear that they were ordained by the elder apostles.

Clement of Rome is called an apostle by Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 200); and the seventy disciples are named in the list of apostles by Hippolytus (A.D. 220).

Luke also is called an apostle in an early Syriac document.

The story of King Abgarus and Jesus Christ was probably not forged by Eusebius. An ancient Syriac copy of it has been found containing further details. The date of the pretended letters of Jesus and Abgar is A.D. 29. The Apostle Thaddeus goes to Edessa the same year, and Simon Kepha is in Persia before A.D. 40, healing the sick. King Abgar writes to Tiberius and receives a reply. The crucifixion is in A.D. 29, and the ascension at Pentecost. Simon Kepha is killed by the sword at Rome under Nero. Another account has Paul beheaded and Kepha crucified with his head downward after serving as "Superintendent of the Rulers" in Italy twenty-five years.

There are six so-called apostolic fathers, namely, Clement, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Papias.

In the Greek Epistle, ascribed to Clement, the writer names Paul, Kephas, and Apollos. The epistle is one of the earliest Christian documents, and must hav been written soon after the death of Paul.

The Epistle of Barnabas is of uncertain date and doubtful authenticity.

The Book of Hermas never names Jesus or Christ, quotes only from apocryphal scripture, and recognizes in a vision the Sibyl as the symbol of the church.

Ignatius was not martyred at Rome, but was thrown to wild beasts at Antioch A.D. 115, soon after a violent earthquake, to appease the wrath of the gods. The Ignatian literature is a mass of forgery.

Polycarp is said to hav suffered martyrdom at Smyrna about A.D. 167 at the age of 86. The accounts of his martyrdom are fabulous and the Epistle of Polycarp is probably spurious.

Papias of Hieropolis in Phrygia is said to hav suffered martyrdom about A.D. 165. His prophetic description of the fecundity of the Millenarian grapevine is extremely ridiculous. Eusebius regarded him as "very limited in his comprehension." What Papias is said to hav said about Matthew, Mark, Andrew, Peter, James, and the two Johns, is only hearsay at best.

*The "Life of Simon Kepha, alias St. Peter," was printed in a series of chapters in the Boston Investigator from Feb. 4, 1880, to Aug. 9, 1882; and the life of Paul in a like series in THE TRUTH SEEKER from Nov. 25, 1882, to Sept. 20, 1884. The whole has undergone most careful revision, preparatory to republication.

Religion and Morality.

People hav become so accustomed to hear religion and morality linked together that they are apt to lose sight of the fact that the two hav no natural connection. Confounding the worship of God with the duties of man to man is a modern innovation. Religion, originally, had no connection with ethics. It is the last refuge of the pious to shelter themselvs behind the moral law, and to pretend that a good life is the result of faith in God It is a gigantic and a dangerous error. Morality built upon a religious belief is of a false and spurious kind. It is more for show than use. It is founded on a delusion, and will not stand against the rough winds of this world's trials.

Many generations of religious people, believers in and worshipers of God, had run their course before it occurred to any of them that a good life was in any way connected with his service. I do not think the majority hav discovered it even yet. At any rate, if they hav accepted it in theory, they are ignorant of the means of reducing it to practice. This is a secret still, and so I am disposed to think it will remain to all time.

The God of the Old Testament certainly did not teach morality either by precept or example. So long as he had prayers enough and blood enough, and his people did not go astray after other Gods, he was pretty well content. Had we been residents on the earth in those days we should hav preferred to pitch our tents as far from him and from his chosen people as we could hav conveniently managed. The men after his own heart, those with whom he delighted to converse and whom he selected to place in power, were, to say the least of it, rather undesirable neighbors. Now a change has taken place. The Jews of old cut throats and robbed their neighbors, all for the sake of Jehovah. The Christians of our day refrain from those little pleasant exercises, all for his sake, too. The Jews sometimes forget his will, and so do the Christians. The children of Israel were occasionally more merciful than their God, and had to be threatened with dreadful chastisments to make them obey him. The disciples of Jesus do not always find the more gentle instructions of their master agreeable to their tastes, and hav to be frightened with burning brimstone and the immortal worm. How often do our pious friends assure us that, if it were not for their religion, they would cut our throats and rob us of all we possess. Christianity has so changed their hearts and made them so good and full of charity. They would so like to wear golden crowns and play eternally upon harps, and hav such an objection to bathing in lakes of fire, that for the sake of their religion, and with the help of the police, they will let us keep our lives and our dollars. Always excepting, of course, when these last are required for the support of God's holy house and his ministers.

That religion causes its followers to lead better lives than they would without it is the sheerest humbug that was ever uttered. It is the parson's cry to make people believe they do something for the money they get. When people get a clear idea of what they mean by the words moral and morality, the last chance of the clergy will be gone. In order to mix up two things so inconsistent as religion and morality, they hav to alter the signification of the latter word. It does not mean in their mouths what it means in the mouths of right-thinking men.

Morality, according to the divines, is acting with a view to please God. According to common sense, it is acting with the object of benefiting ourselvs and our fellow-men. He who does the greatest amount of good to the greatest number on earth, according to his capacity and opportunities, is the most moral man according to the natural law, but in a religious sense it is he who acts only for the gratification of somebody up in the sky of whom he knows nothing.

If by morality we understand utility, we hav a natural and sufficient motiv to guide us. We may be mistaken in the means we employ, but we can never be mistaken in the end we strive for. But the will of a God who never makes known his will except through the medium of doubtful interpreters must ever be a very doubtful guide. We see its uncertainty exemplified constantly in the lives of those who profess to be led by it. They are always straining at gnats and swallowing camels. One man will build up a fortune by trickery and deceit, but he would not taste a mutton chop on a Friday. Another will oppress his workmen and grind them down to starvation wages, but he would not miss his morning and evening prayer. A third will hav very confused notions of the distinction between his own property and that of others, but he is quite clear that his right place on Sunday is in the church belonging to his own sect. Every man's God is a magnified and somewhat shadowy portrait of himself, and the will of his God bears in most cases a striking resemblance to his own desires.

I remember many years ago hearing a clergyman remark that cruelty to animals was no sin, because God had given to man entire control over the beasts of the field. There is the whole secret of religious morality. The human heart knows that it is wrong to inflict pain, but wrong is right if you hav a license from heaven to commit it. We can never sufficiently realize the danger of this doctrin. We can never separate it from religious morality. It is an integral part of it. Vice becomes virtue if God approve. Crime wins heaven, if it be done for the Lord's sake. With most men human virtue is stronger than faith, or we should hav a bad time of it. But it is not so with all. There are fanatics here and there who raise the knife as Abraham did over Isaac. There are bloodthirsty warriors who wield the sword of "the Lord and of Gideon." There are persecutors who visit fine and imprisonment upon Sabbath-breakers and blasphemers. And as long as there are such, we know that religion and morality are yet unhappily mixed in the minds of men, and must not cease in proclaiming the truth that the good man is he whose life is serviceable to his fellows.

The bad man is he whose life brings suffering and loss to his neighbors. He is often the man who by religious influence has gained control over his neighbor's dollars. A Sunday or two since Talmage is reported to hav said in a sermon, "If your gospel will not answer to common honesty, the sooner you close up your gospel and throw it into the ocean the better." Quite so. Close it up, throw it into the ocean of reason, and the tide will carry it far away from our shore. E. J. Bowtell.

New Light On the Bible.

On Sunday morning, Nov. 9th, Professor Swing preached a sermon on the light in which Christians of to-day view the Bible. He remarked in the beginning that "it would not do to take the literal parts for the inspired parts," and proceeded to show up some of the inconsistencies, absurdities, and cruelties of Bible stories with a spirit that would hav done credit to a rank Infidel. It must hav been like a bit of holiday that he could do this freely, and he gave his fancy and sense of humor a loose rein, to the enjoyment of his cultured audience and himself.

But this was as far as he went; thus much he had dared because it is so apparent that Christians must dispose of these absurdities, in this enlightened day and age, in some way if they would preserve a reputation for sanity.

It is safe to allude to some of the most glaring inconsistencies of the Bible nowadays, and, really, the light of science has penetrated so far Christians cannot entirely ignore them; but it is dangerous to one's popularity and salary to declare humanity does not need the old book at all, and Professor Swing is not the man to be so daring. He knows, and so informed his congregation, that a literal following of the Bible would lead mankind through deeds of blood, cruelty, and injustice, but he has in reserve a method by which he could renovate the wicked old collection, smooth out the creases, put a glamour over the worst pages, place a new cover on the whole, and hand it back to his semi-christian, semi-radical, anti-nothing congregation; a Bible warranted not to disturb the placid flow of their stagnant thoughts. Infidels are altogether too rude in disposing of the Bible; they shock people when people do not want to be shocked. Professor Swing's plan is so much pleasanter, and leaves them nothing in particular to do that they havn't been accustomed to doing throughout the whole course of their orthodox lives.

"In the new light of to-day," he says, "the Bible is the general unfoldment of God and good. It is a picture of the slow growth of a race up through darkness and ignorance to light and knowledge. It is symbolical of the spiritual development of man. When Moses led the children of Israel out of bondage, a separation of the two kinds of people took place. The Egyptians had the light of reason only, and their glories, ever fading, passed on to Greece and Rome to utterly die out at last. The "chosen people" had the added light of God, and they attained all the Egyptians had with the additional luster of moral greatness.

"Each absurd story in the Bible teaches some great moral lesson if one only looks for it, and while once a literal rendering of Bible led Christians along paths of cruelty and wrong, in the light of to-day it leads to light, love, and justice. To its influence we owe the civilization of to-day," etc.

All this was very eloquent, very entertaining, and very soothing, but Professor Swing could hav treated Mother Goose's melodies with equal success. If his audience had had a tenderness for the tales of "hickory, dickory dock," "Jack and Jill," and "little Jack Horner"—a determination to attach a sort of sacredness to them, and a belief in their efficacy in leading to holiness—Professor Swing could, with equal ingenuity, hav arranged the whole to suit their taste, and with less mischievous results, for the result of such teaching can but be mischievous. To thus soothe a newly-awakened sense of justice, or the uneasiness of a vaguely-disturbed conscience, is to check the onward march of true progress. His congregation of three or four thousand people are educated, intelligent members of society who hav seen the wrongs and absurdities of ordinary orthodox creeds, but hav not given up their bred-in-the-bone prejudices. Their pastor, instead of lifting the curtain and letting the grand light of natural truth on the old abominable ideas of total depravity, vicarious atonement, everlasting punishment, submission to powers that be, persecution of the unbelieving, etc., calms their feelings, covers up all that is disagreeable and revolting, sugar-coats the Bible, and givs it to them whole. He tells them that our grand civilization is due to the influences of the Bible and Christianity; and this may be true, for our civilization is nothing to boast of. When one remembers the patient suffering of the poor, the empty-handed toilers, the poor little children, wearing away weary lives in factories worse than dungeons, the landless, homeless men, willing and anxious for a chance to work, the millionaires who pile up wealth in their idleness, the discoveries and improvements of science, which our civilization knows so little how to dispose of that they are almost a curse to the masses—when one remembers all these, one may well credit our civilization to a religion that binds men's minds to superstitions; that teaches sin may be committed and another suffer the punishment; that slavery is right, and people should submit to the authority they find placed over them. Yes, I would much rather lay our present civilization to the Bible than to giv science and reason the credit. If science and reason cannot show a better state of affairs after they hav had full sway one hundred years, I hope there will be a complete winding up of all human work.

If Professor Swing, with his eloquence, beautiful flow of words, and personal influence, were to tell the people the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, what an ally for liberty and justice he would become! If he would tell people where they had been blinded and wronged, and what their inherent rights were, the millennium would not be so far away; for when the masses of the people understand that they hav a right to think for themselvs, a right to as much of earth's surface as each needs to sustain life, and a right to the full results of toil, the present condition of dire poverty on the one hand, and enormous wealth on the other, of hypocrisy and false morality arrayed over blind faith and craven obedience would vanish. It is this condition which makes this world a "vale of tears." Lizzie M. Swank.

Sunday Trains.

The petition asking for a law to prohibit railroad travel on Sunday is being largely signed by pious Christians. And a counter-petition favoring the running of railroad trains as a necessity is also being signed by the sensible people—those who liv on this God and man blessed earth.

As a day of rest, of releasement from the daily duties of life, personal cleanliness, and change of clothing, physical recreation and religious devotion, the Sabbath is among the best institutions the stream of time has brought down to us.

It would indeed be a hallowed day if man and beast could hav one day in seven of entire freedom from labor and care. But nature and providence hav not so constructed the world. And then railroads, steamboats, etc., were not even anticipated when the Sabbath was instituted, requiring uninterrupted travel regardless of day or night. And why should not this rule apply to ocean as well as land travel, and so stop in mid-ocean? What passengers on a long journey would consent to stop over on the Lord's day just to do him reverence and keep him good natured? Could God turn his attention from the sparrows and mathematics, and keep the animals in transit comfortable in inclement weather? Perhaps Jonah went ashore to keep the Sabbath, and so lost his passage—who knows?

One pious, scrupulous sky-pilot forbade milk being left at his door Sabbath morning, although the divine architect caused the udders of the patient cows to fill on Sunday as on other days, and must be relieved or suffer. Doubtless he gathered his two days' allowance of money on Saturday, or perhaps conquered his scruples, or maybe got an extra deal of pardoning grace, and, deadheading it through to some soup-house, dished out stale pottage to hungry souls. We hav the highest Christian authority that the Sabbath is our servant, not master.

To omit running trains and other public means of travel on Sunday would be a crime against man and beast. The objectiv deal of this petition is doubtless at excursion trains on Sunday, the only means that many an honest toiler has during the week for "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

I regard all days as sacred time, and the one day in seven an especial blessing in many ways, yet I challenge any man, or set of men, to dictate, by statute or otherwise, how any man, or body of men shall observe that day. Ah, Mr. Clergymen, you are too late. Reason has got the under hold on superstition, and will come out best in every encounter.

Ayer, Mass. Elijah Myrick.

Obscenity Gage.

In an excellent article, some years ago, on the "Comstock laws," Mr. T. C. Leland thought that it had become necessary that we should hav an "obscenity gage," some sort of a rule or measure by which we could determin exactly what is and what is not obscene. A recent event shows that Mr. Leland's suggestion has a practical as well as a humorous side. It will be remembered that a Mr. Muller, a salesman in the establishment of Mr. Bonaventure down town, was arrested for selling alleged indecent photographs. His counsel undertook to show that they were photographs of paintings on public exhibition in the Paris Salon. Experts were called to testify, and, if possible, giv the distinguishing line between pure art and indecent art. But all such evidence was ruled out and the prisoner was convicted. Exceptions were taken, and the case carried to the Court of Appeals. This tribunal has handed down its decision sustaining the lower court. It holds that expert testimony is inadmissible. It was for the jury to say whether any such photographs or pictures were obscene. From this it would appear that there is no safety for any one engaged in the picture business; nor, indeed, for any one engaged in the book business, to publish anything whatsoever. There is no rule by which any dealer in pictures, or any publisher of books, can determin whether he is rendering himself liable or otherwise. The question must be determined by a jury. The jury, if made up of thoroughly intelligent people, may decide intelligently; but, as juries are often composed, an accused person, however innocent in motiv, is in danger of fine and imprisonment. The press very generally condemned the arrest of Mr. Muller at the time it was made. It was said that just such pictures were used in decorating the ceilings by frescoers, and, if we remember rightly, these very photographs were intended as patterns for such a purpose. The political party coming into power, which shall hav the courage to wipe, as with a sponge from a slate, the entire Comstock legislation of this country, national and state, will do a piece of work which will entitle it to the lasting gratitude of all decent-minded people. E. B. Foote, Sen., M.D.

Unitarian Progress.

Two reviews of the attitude of Unitarians hav been presented in recent addresses by M. D. Conway and M. J. Savage. Mr. Conway gave a farewell address to his congregation in London, after twenty-one years' labor. He was the son of a slave-holder, educated at Harvard, and, under the influence of Emerson and Theodore Parker, became a radical antislavery Unitarian. He was called to the Unitarian church of this city, and, although his church was conservativ and pro-slavery, took radical grounds on the question of slavery. His services were dispensed with. The church was compelled by the drift of the war to follow in the wake of the progress of the age—a progress where, as a rule, the church lagged behind the bronzed farmer or rugged workingman—and sided with justice on the question of human rights, because men, in their new-born freedom of thought, were questioning the humanity of creeds and the divinity of gods that tolerated slavery. To-day All-Souls' church of Washington is, in many senses, one of the Liberal Unitarian churches of the Union. Distinctions of race do not exist, and Agnostics find friendly greeting from its members. Its present pastor, Dr. R. R. Shippen, is a genial, able representativ of the progressiv element of the denomination, frank in his statements, brave in his utterances, and does not hesitate to giv the Liberals of this country credit for the good work they are doing against the religious superstitions of the age.

The society also procures the services of the leading ministers of the denomination in a winter course of sermons. Mr. Savage, of Boston, has, for at least two years, been here, and no one has a larger audience. His most radical utterances are heartily received.

No one will deny that in twenty-three years the Unitarian church of Washington has passed from the stage of conservativ decay to a condition of activ, aggressiv life.

The complement to this is the progress made by the National Unitarian Conference, which is well stated in Mr. Savage's sermon of Sept. 28, 1884. He notices that the first protest of Unitarianism against orthodox creeds as untrue, was made within the limits of the Bible. "Few in that day," he says, "thought of going outside of the Bible, or of supposing that there could be any divine truth beyond the limits of its covers." In 1841 Theodore Parker took a forward step, placed the Bible on the level of other books, and preached a gospel of humanity, of heroism in this life, of honest thought and fearless criticism. Turning his back on the past, ceasing to dream of another world as the great duty of the race, he took up the present life, and by word and deed, by dauntless courage in the pulpit and on the platform, coupled with infinit tenderness and pity for the fallen, the poor, and the oppressed, he made himself an intellectual power—a leader for the young men of his day, a pioneer in the work that has, since that time, been done for freedom of thought.

In orthodox communities his works were placed under ban, as equally wicked with those of Paine and Voltaire. His own denomination banished him from their pulpits. A few years later a National Unitarian Conference was held, and to check Agnostic tendencies in the church, the majority accepted a dogmatic creed as the tie that henceforth was to bind them. The young men of brains and courage stepped out of the conference and hav proved that manliness brings its own reward. In the progress of the age, the Unitarians, as a body, stand practically upon the platform of Theodore Parker, while some of their leaders, who mold and shape the practical creed of the church, rival the Agnostics of the day in the breadth and freedom of their utterances.

Under the leadership of Mr. Savage an amendment has been adopted to their constitution which declares that the dogmatic basis is only a statement of belief of the majority of the denomination, but not a test of fellowship, and it is expected that in a short time the dogmatic basis will be abandoned altogether. He says: "We are no longer fighting over a creed, as to whether it should be a new or an old one, broad or narrow; as to whether it should admit more or less into the kingdom of heaven. We are no longer fighting over any ritual, any form or method, or manner of garment, or attitude of worship. We hav given up in our body all contest over the clothing of the religious life; we care only for the heart and the spirit. And so we are ready, as is no religious body of Christendom, to concentrate our thought, our time, our opportunity, our money, on the solution of the great practical problem of the religious life of to-day.

"And what is that practical problem? Is it not to find a rational basis for the ethical and religious trust and hope; to find a footing for faith, and to keep all the dear and sacred hopes of the heart along with it; to be religious and to be rational and to liv frankly in this world at the same time? It is to apply this theoretical conception to the practical molding of the life of the individual, of the family, of society, of business, of politics; to apply it to the solution of all the great contests between capital and labor, between rich and poor, between ignorance and the educated, which threaten to be so obstructiv in the near future, if they are not rightly solved. This is the great work of religion in this nineteenth century. We do not surrender any hope of the future life, but we recognize that grand saying of Thoreau, 'One world at a time.' We propose to be religious here, having no fear but that our religion will bridge the gulf of death, and lead us into any life or to the possession of any other planet that may await us in the future." He adds: "The future of the educated part of humanity is not to be religious in the old sense of the word. Mark what I say—the old sense of the word. The old theologies are doomed to pass away, because they are not in accord with the best thought of the world." He claims that modern Unitarianism is fitted to join in the intellectual leadership of the world, because "it is afraid of no truth. Indeed, its creed is simply ascertained truth."

Also that there are great masses of men who do not attend church, because they hav outgrown the creeds, and that it is the mission of Unitarians to "build broad enough our religious home to take in the grand unchurched masses of our country."

This definition of the aims of Unitarians and the practical steps taken indicate that in the future it is not to be a type of cold, intellectual culture, unresponsiv to the warm heart-beat of the young, denying the divinity of Christ and yet making belief in Christ a test of fellowship, contending for the supremacy of reason in religion and yet worshiping, in some degree at least, the Bible as divine, and perpetuating formalities of religious service which bear a close relation to the sacraments of the Catholic church, and were founded in superstition, fostered by the civil and ecclesiastical power of Christian rulers, after the church had converted nations by the sword, subdued heresy by their church councils, and blotted out the early history of Christianity and the grand literature of pagan nations wherever it gained a foothold.

No church which depends upon its ritual and its sacraments, which cherishes a revelation, and lifts up Christ as the model man of the world, or the center of the trinity; which demands that faith shall be blind, and reason surrendered to the custody of the priest, or the conference, or the synod, can compete with the Catholic church which now comes to the front as an aggressiv force in this country. It is boldly declared that the Catholic church has been doing missionary work, but must now be organized, its ecclesiastical laws enacted, and the canon law of the church enforced as at Rome itself. The lines are to be drawn; heresy in the church is to be hunted down; the church to be made a compact mass to be handled by the hierarchy in society and in politics. When the candidates of the two leading parties compete for Catholic votes and cultivate the good will of priests, when certificates of good Christian standing are sought and published in the interest of one, and the other assures Catholic prelates that he did nothing to influence the legislature of his state in refusing to pass their "freedom of worship bill," we can see the drift and trend of the orthodox, and especially the Catholic, priesthood of the country. Catholicism is hostil to the free institutions of this country. It is the enemy of Freethought and secular schools. It strangles reason and deifies superstition. It dethrones humanity, and creates a deity cruel and mercenary. It has taxed the poor and lowly to provide revenues for the struggle with Freethought in Europe, and is now closing its serried ranks here that it may dominate the life of the nation, and, in time, bring about, in fact, the union of church and state.

Modern Unitarianism is in its aims and spirit opposed to the Catholic church, and to survive it must, in the conflict soon to come, stand with the Secularists and Agnostics of the country, on the platform of an absolute divorce of church and state, and absolute freedom of thought. Jesuitism is not dead. It works by different methods for the same ends as its inquisitors did in other centuries. Its clergy reverence the cross not as the emblem of the humanity of Christ, but as the symbol of the authority of its prelates, in the name of God to doom to eternal torment the soul of the priest or the layman who fails to obey the mandates of the church. Aggressiv Unitarianism promises to be an organized intellectual force against the superstitions and the pretensions of the Catholic church. In this view of the case, its advance in national conference and in its relations to the Freethinkers of the country during the past few years, givs promis that Secularism will find a hearty and manly support among its members.

The Bennett League Sociable.

The sociable has been held and voted a success. This gathering was held under the auspices of the Bennett Liberal League of New York, as a reception to the old and new officers of the national organization. It was the first thing of the kind recorded in the modern history of New York, and there was not a little curiosity rife to know how these distinguished and dignified persons would comport themselvs on a festiv occasion of this sort. At a little past 8 o'clock the hall was fairly well filled with as fine an audience of ladies and gentlemen as could be gathered anywhere. Mr. Wakeman, the retiring president of the National League, first called the attention of the visitors in the direction of the platform. The time had come, he said, to cry, "The king is dead—long liv the king!" It was proper, he continued, in the order of nature, that the dead should depart to giv place to the new. Therefore with resignation he, as the dead king, gave over the presidency of the League into the hands of his successor. Mr. Wakeman urged upon his hearers the gospel of cheerfulness, though there was a tinge of sadness pervading his words. The demonstrativ applause which greeted the abdicating king showed that he never stood higher than at present with the Liberals of New York.

Mr. Putnam, as president of the Bennett League, was master of ceremonies. Previous to beginning the regular program, he paid a proper tribute to Mr. Wakeman, and added that the dead king was not dead; he was immortal.

Mr. Ed. G. Boys, a young man of rising note, began the musical exercises by rendering "It was a Dream" in a good tenor voice. He was recalled. Miss Leona Leonard gave, in an equally satisfactory manner, the song, "Forever and Forever." The audience desired a repetition, but Mr. Putnam announced that the limits of time would preclude encores.

Mr. Thomas Mead—"glorious old Tom Mead," as his American friends call him—a veteran in Liberalism, and lifelong friend of Mr. Watts; an actor, poet, and author, now with the Irving company, next gave recitations from Shakspere's "As You Like It," leading up to and concluding with "the seven ages." Previous to his recitation, he addressed a few remarks to the assemblage. As one of the oldest of the living English reformers, it gave him great pleasure to see the Liberal cause springing up in America in so marked a manner, and also to be permitted to join his friends on this side of the water and to contribute to their entertainment. Mr. Mead is a prince of elocutionists, an actor hardly second to Irving himself, and by his art the seven ages of man were so vividly pictured to the audience as to call forth the most hearty applause.

The most striking and effectiv performance of the evening followed. It was Charles Watts's recitation of "The Maniac." The poem opens with a sane man in the cell of an asylum, pleading for release. As the keeper moves away, and as, left alone, the horror of the imprisoned man's situation impresses itself upon him more and more, he develops into a laughing, raving, gibbering maniac. Mr. Watts's rendering was so true to the idea of the author that it was a relief when he brought the recitation to a close, and the agitation of the listeners was allowed to exhale itself in applause.

A duet sung by Mrs. McCune and Miss Leona Leonard brought the audience back out of the gloom in which Mr. Watts's realistic recitation had plunged them, and Mr. Courtlandt Palmer told a funny story in rhyme about some sardines on toast, and the dire consequences which followed the eating of them. There was a good deal of merit in the rhyme, and the effect was convulsing. Mr. Palmer was cheered repeatedly.

Mr. J. C. Johnson told a story and gave a recitation of a similar sort.

Mr. Boys, the tenor, sang another song, and a young violinist, whose name was not announced, played "You'll Remember Me."

A funny and entertaining exhibition followed. Dr. Foote, Jr., having turned the lights out, drew a large screen across the front of the stage, behind which he placed himself and his polyopticon, and upon which he threw pictures, making humorous remarks meanwhile. The first display was of colored gentlemen in fantastic attire. The object of these was not discovered until he made the observation that he wished to accustom the eyes to darkness. Then it broke upon the audience that the darkies were exhibited as a foundation for a joke. Pictures of prominent Liberals followed. There were Messrs. Mendum and Seaver, of the Investigator, succeeded by the engaging face of Miss Susan H. Wixon; then Mrs. Slenker; Mr. Remsburg, Charles Bradlaugh, and T. C. Leland. The serene countenance of D. M. Bennett shone a moment athwart the canvas; and then, like a full moon from behind a cloud, the jolly features of Col. Ingersoll rolled into view. These were received with unstinted applause. Many others met with a similiar reception. The lively Mr. Putnam was displayed as a small boy manipulating a figure that went up and down over the end of a rod. The figure, Dr. Foote christened the Liberal League, and explained that the secretary was "working" it. Mr. Wakeman appeared as a dancing master in the act of executing a graceful step, while a well-known Freethought editor took the form of a cherub, winged and feathered, reposing complacently upon a cloud. The polyopticon promises to become an institution. There is more fun in it than there is in the average prayer-meeting. Dr. Foote, Jr., is the inventor of the instrument, and wants to introduce it to the Liberal public. He will make special discounts to Leagues. Observe his advertisment in another part of this paper (Adv. 1t48).

Dr. Foote's contribution closed the first part of the entertainment, and the orchestra was called in. A late visitor, looking into the hall at about 11 o'clock, saw a brilliant array of some fifty couples of dancers marching down the center of the hall, four abreast, to the music of the band, glorious as an army with banners.

The Liberal Club.

By some unaccountable combination of things, Professor George Vaughan, of Virginia, was imposed upon the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday evening as a lecturer. This individual, who is one of the most unfortunate achievements of the blind workings of nature's forces, has previously appeared before the club as an alleged Freethinker, who rested his claims to distinction upon having ruined every Liberal society in which he had been tolerated as either a member or speaker. If his own word may be taken as truth, he has now, after the manner of the hog returning to his wallow, gone back to the pulpit, where it is hoped he will remain. He is too unreliable to be a Liberal, but has not as yet allowed his propensities sufficient play to land him in the penitentiary. The pulpit being a sort of half-way house, he is as much at home there as a wasp in its nest. These remarks are merely preliminary.

It was rather late when the speaker of the evening arrived. He was accompanied by a child—presumably his daughter. In his hand he carried a back-number silk hat, and he bore the general appearance of a man who had recently traveled a long distance on the cars. The chairman introduced him to the audience in the usual manner. Professor Vaughan removed his overcoat, swabbed his luxurious mouth with a much less luxurious pocket-handkerchief, produced a mass of manuscript, and began a rambling and pointless attack on The Truth Seeker, the writer of these reports, and upon Mr. Charles Watts, whom he referred to as a foreign importation brought here to tell us what he don't know. He then read the following extract from The Truth Seeker of June 28, 1884, which, he held, must hav been written by a fool when the schoolmaster was abroad:

"A word as to Mr. Bennett's employees. They were loyal to a man when Comstock was terrorizing all connected with The Truth Seeker. Because they knew him they held their faith in him when others turned traitors. There was universal sorrow among them when he died; and as his body lay in the temple on the day of his burial, they went there in sad procession, and placed upon his coffin their united offering of flowers."

Without regard either for decency or for the feelings of Mr. Bennett's friends, many of whom were present, the lecturer used this extract as a text for a series of flippant and altogether idiotic jests. The audience failed to see what he was driving at, and he explained that the word "him" in the extract referred, grammatically, to Comstock, and the language was therefore open to misconstruction. This point is not visible to the writer. An excerpt may be made from Professor Vaughan's favorit author, however, as an illustration of the ambiguity with which the speaker imagined himself to be wrestling. A word will be changed; the grammatical construction is unaltered: "And Vaughan said, Saddle me the ass; so they saddled him." In this divine syntax there is an opening for a difference of opinion as to which ass was saddled.

The objections to Liberalism urged by the lecturer, when he had at last sufficiently vented his gall, were that it made men no better except as they were affected by contiguous Christianity; that Positivism was an owl; Agnosticism a revival of Knownothingism; Freethought a house of mud, which there was no chance for the professor to burglarize with profit to himself; that among Liberals the intellect was given an equal chance with the emotions in controling human actions, and that Freethinkers denied the existence of a God and the necessity of faith. In the course of his aberrations, the speaker related parenthetically what Ingersoll said to him, how the poet Longfellow flattered him; what he had said to Parke Godwin, and how John Swinton had taken him into his confidence. There is no reason to believe that either of these distinguished personages ever heard of Professor Vaughan, except, perhaps, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which he has several times received appropriate mention. This custom of detailing interviews with prominent men is characteristic of the professor. Any statement in which the subjectiv order of thought corresponds with the objectiv order of phenomena, he has seldom been detected in uttering; and having vindicated his character as herein described, Professor Vaughan sat complacently and serenely down.

Mr. Charles Watts being in the audience, and having been thus attacked by a member of the club, was invited to make such remarks as the professor's speech might hav suggested. It was much like calling upon a trained gladiator to do battle with a clown. Nothing could be more marked, as Mr. Watts ascended the platform, than the disparity between the two men in personal presence. The difference intellectually was also quite as discernible when Mr. Watts began to speak, and grew more prominent as he proceeded. One by one the lecturer's statements (he had offered no arguments) were called up and their utter emptiness exposed. The speaker gave the philosophical definition of Agnosticism. This for the benefit of the audience; he did not believe that Professor Vaughan had the ability to comprehend it however clearly it might be expounded. The lecturer had drawn no distinction between faith founded on experience and that based upon wild conjecture, and without understanding anything of the ethics of Freethought, he had spent his time criticising the vagaries of alleged Freethinkers and the grammar of a newspaper. While Mr. Watts was speaking Professor Vaughan made an attempt to appear cheerful and unconcerned, but it would not work, and he left the hall, apparently to gather inspiration from some ulterior source—or, perhaps, to be weighed.

Mr. Andrews, without taking the view of either the lecturer or the critic, proceeded to classify the different phases of thought represented by them. The church stood for the emotions, or love; Freethought for the intellect and for justice. The world had been so long under the domination of the former that there was a popular revulsion, a swinging of the pendulum to the opposit arc of the circle, and a terminal conversion into opposits. But the pendulum was only on an excursion, and would return to the center of gravity, which would be a quasi-reconversion. Until people comprehended this idea, and familiarized themselvs with these technicalities, they were not prepared to discuss intelligently the subject of intellectual development.

When Mr. Vaughan came forward to make his closing remarks he lacked the cheerful assurance that had characterized his opening speech. He had evidently found it easier to make a statement than to successfully re-establish one that had been disproved. He would not descend to a debate. However, he struggled out of the difficulty as well as could be expected. He raised many laughs, and was encouraged thereby until he discovered that they were at his own expense, when he proceeded to make himself ridiculous by attempting to be pathetic. But his "gall" deserted him, and his audience was rapidly doing the same. He had nothing to proceed upon, and as everything behind him had been removed, he could not go back. Therefore he took the only course left him and sat down, which he ought to hav done sooner.

Mr. Vaughan as a lecturer is a failure. His heart, generally speaking, is not in his work, and does not indorse what his tongue says. He might succeed as an actor. He could personate the Mormon Elder Bezum in the play of "A Hundred Wives," and would not need to make up for the character further than to put on a clean shirt.

Friday evening, the 28th, Professor Eccles lectures before the club on "Our Microscopic Foes."

HOW TO PREPARE FOR AND INSURE SUCCESS OF LECTURES.

"CLEVELAND, O.

"What do you expect the Leagues or Liberal friends to do to prepare the way for you? I think it would be well to state as plainly as you can, so all would know how to act.

"JOSEPH GILLSON."

Many friends hav made similar inquiries. In reply I would say that to me it does not seem reasonable to expect any very great or permanent benefit from one lecture alone. Of course it may arouse some interest, stir up opposition, afford the Liberals an intellectual feast and a good happy time, but if not followed up the good results soon fade away. Doubts are engendered, but convictions are not settled, by one lecture.

When possible, at least three lectures should be arranged for. Of course, if only one can be afforded, by all means secure that one. But generally a little more effort, courage, and confidence would insure a regular course.

It is not enough to tear down the strongholds of superstition, to expose the fallacies of the Christian faith, and prove the justice of our demands for the secularization of our government. We must interest the heart, as well as educate the head. We must build up institutions, better, purer, more beneficial. Each local League must be made, socially and educationally, far superior to church and Sunday-school. To do this, the women must not only be enlisted, but induced to become enthusiastic workers in the cause. The children must be interested and amused, as well as instructed in science and the laws of their being, so that the local League, with its science school on Sunday, shall ever be associated with memories of pleasure and delight. To accomplish this, the indifferent must be aroused from their lethargy to glad performance of duty, the zealous cheered and encouraged, and the "almost persuaded" fully convinced and inspired with courage to avow and liv up to their convictions. From one to three weeks' diligent work of the most able and faithful lecturer can only fairly start this great work. The lecturer should always be thoroughly posted on the condition, wants, and feelings of the people, so that he can present just the subjects in which the majority are most interested, and in such a manner as to win attention and awaken thought, without needlessly arousing wrath and prejudice.

Before the advent of the lecturer, there is much work to be done by resident Liberals. Yet, if there is but one earnest, honest-hearted Liberal in a neighborhood, he, or she, should not feel discouraged, or regard all effort as hopeless. Real, earnest effort is almost certain to result in the establishment of a local League. Commence by loaning your paper to friends and neighbors. Get people to read Liberal literature. Send for a dozen copies of Ingersoll's "Orthodoxy," a dozen of Remsburg's "False Claims," and a few copies of Paine's "Age of Reason." Circulate them judiciously, but persistently.

Do not giv them away. Loan, or, when possible, sell them. Loan them as a great personal favor, and express your anxiety they should be very carefully preserved and restored to you unsoiled soon as read. When it is understood you prize them highly, people will regard them as of importance, and consequently read with care and interest. Giv them away, scatter them on every side, and they will command no more attention, be read with no more interest, than quack medicin almanacs.

Reading Liberal publications naturally creates desire to hear some living exponent of Liberalism. Talk over the possibilities of having lectures. Consult with each and every one the least interested, so they will sense their wishes are consulted—you are making efforts that their desires may be gratified.

Ascertain best terms on which suitable hall can be secured. Then head subscription list, and induce all interested to subscribe. When sufficient amount is subscribed to pay hall rent and advertising, write to Secretary Putnam or me, giving all particulars.

It is not possible to over-advertise, yet discretion and judicious economy must be exercised. When the hand-bills are printed, take pains to hav them thoroughly distributed on the outskirts of the town. Make sure they are distributed within a radius of ten miles of the place of meeting. Inclose hand-bill with kind letter of earnest invitation to all friends within reachable distance.

To trust to some uninterested person to distribute handbills, without overseeing them, is to waste money, and insures a "beggarly array of empty benches."

Advertise in the papers published at place of meeting, and adjacent villages. Not a little four-line advertisment only found after diligent search, but a good display advertisment. To half advertise is to court failure.

If possible hav the lecturers board at the house of some of the friends, and thus save hotel bills. Hav program carefully made out, so that from the time the lecturer arrives every hour of his stay may be profitably employed; visiting, urging, appealing, counseling, and inspiring with zeal all who are Liberally inclined, and organizing or perfecting organization of local League, so that the good work shall be successfully carried on after his departure.

Dear reader, hav you not too long been misrepresented, denounced, and ostracized? Is it not fully time, in justice to yourself, your family, and friends, that you should make an earnest, self-sacrificing effort to let people know the truth—what Liberalism teaches, the justice of the demands of Liberalism, and the superiority of the gospel of humanity to the superstitions and delusions of Christianity?

You revere the memory of that noble, self-sacrificing truth seeker, the lamented D. M. Bennett. Being dead, he yet speaketh: "There are people enough of Liberal views in this country if they would only hav independence to speak out, to be a power in the land. Yes, if the Liberals of America will hold up their heads, boldly utter their honest convictions; if they will organize, and work in concert, they will be an influential body of men and women. They will be capable of doing a great amount of good, and be as thoroughly respected and honored by the upright and good as any organization in our country." Let us heed this counsel.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

I shall be at Salamanca, N. Y., during the Freethinkers' Convention, December 4th to 8th, and hope to meet friends who desire to arrange for lectures, or who wish assistance in effecting or perfecting organization of local Leagues.

I am very desirous to make engagements to lecture every evening and every Sunday afternoon (Sunday mornings, too, whenever practicable) from December 8th to the time of the grand gathering of Liberals at Altoona the last week in January (the Pennsylvania State League annual meeting in connection with the Paine celebration), and from that time forward until May 15, 1885, when I expect to start out in the "tented field" with the National Liberal League's new sixty-feet-in-diameter tent, and carry the war into Africa until the assembling of our next National Liberal League Congress in September. Friends of Liberty, write to me. I will answer every letter. Address Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, Box 104, North Parma, Monroe county, N. Y., and letters will be promptly forwarded to me. In case of funerals, telegraph E. M. Macdonald, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 33 Clinton Place, New York, who will at once repeat telegram to me, and Mr. Watts, or Mr. Putnam, or I will, when within the bounds of possibility, be sure to respond.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS, Chairman Ex. Com. N. L. L.

ALBANY MEETING.

Sunday was a rainy day indeed, and the Jupiter of the skies seemed determined to quench our enthusiasm—but did not by any means succeed. A fair audience gathered together to listen to Mr. Watts's lecture on "Christian Claims Criticised." The good effect of the discourse, which was a thorough examination of Biblical Christianity from the standpoint of common sense, was seen in the fact that after a short appeal by Mr. Putnam over thirty dollars was raised for the National Fund, which was a most generous response indeed to the new work of Liberalism. The storm became more fierce by evening, but the Liberals showed their backbone by presenting a good appearance and greeting to Mr. Watts, who spoke upon "The Aims and Methods of Secularism." His address was received with frequent applause, and stimulated his listeners to increase the fund, so that the total subscription for the day amounted to $68 78. This shows that the League is bound to progress in all sorts of weather and will march to victory in storm and sunshine both.

The Albany Liberals hav been faithful for years in the work of mental emancipation and can show a good record of things accomplished. Some of the best men of the city are connected with it, who are both earnest and able. Mrs. Henrica Iliohan has begun a Liberal Sunday-School and is doing an admirable work among the children. Let us hav these Liberal schools wherever it is possible.

In spite of the torrents, Troy sent her good representativ, Robert Wade, to the meeting, who for years has been a stanch upholder of our cause, at the same time winning the respect of his opponents. His contribution of $25 shows how deeply interested he is in the future of Liberalism. Such assistance is an earnest of the harvest that is to be.

Next Sunday, Nov. 30th, Mr. Watts will lecture in Philadelphia, morning and evening, and Mr. Putnam in the afternoon. Mr. Watts will also lecture at the same place Monday and Tuesday evenings, Dec. 1st and 2d. Both gentlemen then proceed to the Salamanca Convention, after which they go to Canada, arriving in Toronto on Friday, Dec. 12th.

The Salamanca Convention.

The N. Y., Lake Erie and Western R.R. Co. will return for one-third fare all who attend the Convention by their line or any of its branches west of and including Binghamton; the N. Y., Ohio, and Pa. R.R. Co. will sell one-third rate return tickets. The Rochester and Pittsburgh R.R. Co. will do the same, and the N. Y., Ohio, and Pa. R.R. Co., will return passengers attending the Convention at one cent a mile.

The following local committees hav been appointed by the Freethinkers of Salamanca. On decorations, Mrs. M. C. Fitts, Mrs. Dr. Colgrove, J. S. Whipple, C. R. Gibson, Mrs. O. S. Vreeland, L. W. Zuver, Charles L. Stough. On music, Professor A. D. Lane, Mrs. Henry O. Wait, Mrs. Mina Seymour. On social party, Sam. Coon, Frank Gardner, Juliett Simmons.

The Christian Religion.

At the risk of seeming presumptuous in intruding on more valuable space, I take the liberty of jotting down a few of my reflections pertaining to Christianity, its dupes and followers.

In contemplating the various phases of human nature, I am often led to notice how little we can understand the underdrift of a man's sentiments by his casual remarks in ordinary conversation. Some whom we would suppose had no religious bias whatever, when more directly approached, teem with the most inveterate bigotry, the blindest fanaticism, the most virulent hostility to Liberalism in its every phase. Theirs is the (so-called) religion of terrorism, of coercion; they would unhesitatingly ostracize every one else not perfectly in accord with their own narrow-minded and illiberal ideas.

"Why no," they will arrogantly insist, "the smartest men of this or any other age hav vainly endeavored to prove the Bible untrue, but it has invariably resulted in failure; the good old book is divinely inspired; the prophets and apostles who composed it were most holy and sanctified men; they were incapable of any mistakes. We are thus compelled to accept their records as finally conclusiv, and them as the express and perfect messengers of God to fallen man!"

Can human credulity any further go? To my mind the Apocryphal New Testament bears precisely the same impress of divine inspiration those deluded souls accord to the revised and infallible edition now so authoritativly pronounced canonical. In fact, the Apocryphal appears to me to be the most original and authentic, if it is not a parody on words to style anything authentic bearing on its face so plainly the evidence of being a lie. In the story so naively told of the infancy, in the blooming record of St. Mary (the Virgin mother of omnipotent God), we hav the rough-hewn stick of timber; it only remained for the most Christian Emperor Constantine and his pious bishops to plane and smooth it to their own chaste ideas, and lo! we hav the canonical New Testament, which to deny is eternal damnation; to disbelieve, eternal moral and spiritual death.

Can we ever believe our future salvation depends in any degree on a certain combination of circumstances over which we hav absolutely not the slighest control? Not finding it possible to giv implicit credence to the utterly absurd and unnatural, are we to be malignantly tortured through all the endless ages of eternity, simply because we innocently obeyed the dictates of pure reason? Viewing the question from a purely philosophical standpoint, it must be evident to all that no man, or set of men, can decide the standard of belief for mankind; hence the deduction is plain; we need not hav the slightest dread of the anathema or threat of either pope, priest, or prophet.

The Christian religion is evidently but another phase of those blind fallacies which held the East in mental bondage centuries before the ineffable Christ came on earth, and which still enthralls millions of the orientals, the most abject slaves to the power of priestcraft. A trinity of persons composing the supreme godhead is supremely Brahmanical; it is really astonishing all good Christians hav not ere this discovered the close relationship, and, instead of attempting to Christianize the heathen world, they should clasp hands with them, and kiss their mutual chains in fraternal joy. If the three-faced Buddhistic god does not perfectly represent the trinity of Christianity, I am utterly at a loss what other comparison to draw.

A philosophical mind may smile serenely at the ludicrous sincerity with which those imaginary divinities are reverenced and worshiped by their respectiv devotees, albeit the contemplation must be inevitably tinged with a sentiment of sorrow for the ignorant and deluded dupes. Millions of lives and untold wealth hav been expended on those fictitious rulers of the universe, and still the Juggernaut of superstition rolls crushing on, regardless of human sorrow, unmindful of mundane woe. Will mankind ever shake off this terrible incubus, and, ignoring the existence of any other world than this, devote themselvs exclusivly to the genial precepts of Nature and the dictates of her beauteous handmaid, Reason? Can we Liberals who hav happily rent asunder the chains of blind servility to superstition ever hope to see this Utopia finally consummated? If the Christian religion was originally and divinely intended for the acceptance and salvation of all mankind, why, may we inquire, was it not simultaneously promulgated to all without regard to mere geographical or educational conditions? Or again, why is the groundwork of this divine scheme of salvation of such an absurd and grotesque character that the veriest savage, much more the educated and enlightened mind, receives it with doubt—in short, the most positiv and reasonable skepticism? Being merely an innovation, and thus fatally deficient in the prime element of originality, it has ever been questioned by critically examining minds, and, at the present day, instead of gaining ground, is, in effect, gradually, though none the less surely, losing its sway over the mass, and, as may be safely predicted, will eventually die the death of all other baseless absurdities. Any theory, however illiberal or nonsensical, may be fully demonstrated by a text here or there in those so-called sacred writings. Does the Christian world deny the fact? If so, let me call attention to the numberless doctrins and different sects, each and every one the diametrical antagonist of the other, rendering confusion worse confounded, but all, as a matter of course, immediately under the guidance and protection of their divine master.

Let me ask, are Luther's dogmatic rulings coincided in by even a respectable minority at the present day, taking, as he did, the stand that what was written was to be taken literally, and, per sequence, could admit of neither cavil nor dispute unless at the positiv risk of eternal hell-fire? Are Calvin's teachings of predestination and salvation by election implicitly believed in by any considerable number, even among those who are duly accredited as professors of the tyrant creed he originated? Will any good Christian deny that even his soul-freezing doctrins can be sustained by certain passages in the canonical New Testament? I would as soon run the risk of even the horrible hell he gloated over as subscribe to the miserable creed he had the misfortune to inaugurate.

As all other human beings, I am, of course, liable to erroneous impressions, yet I am fully satisfied that, simply taking nature and reason as our natural guides, a better system of ethics than Luther or Calvin, a purer morality than the Pauline, is within the reach of all not blinded by old-time superstition or weighted down by a soul-degrading and venomous fanaticism.

But the question may be reasonably asked by our opponents—the Christian world at large—"What hav you to present us in lieu of Christianity?" Let us reason one moment, my friends, and see if we cannot discover a nobler example to follow than lying and cowardly Abraham; than murderous Moses, than adulterous David, than licentious Solomon, than groaning and disgusting Jeremiah, than renegade Jonah or blasphemous Job. We need only take as our pure ensamples the oracles of nature, as we hav them forcibly delivered to us on every hand, to learn the most faultless lessons of morality; the most ingenious and charming teaching of social and fraternal love. Were we to do so, how easy to dispense with the devil and all his host of infernal imps—called into existence, as we are blandly assured, and most admirably adapted by their tastes and inclinations to the cheerful pursuit of torturing human souls during ages and ages of eternal pain. And having casually mentioned his sulphuric majesty, let us for a moment discuss his possible status in the economy of the universe. Was the devil self-created, or is he a unique emanation from the hands of that peerless God of love whom Christians so devoutly worship? Assuming this latter premis for the nonce, we are absolutely compelled to admit that God must hav been actuated with a purely sinister intention in calling such a being into existence. Satan occupies a very prominent position, according to orthodox belief, but God being his creator as well as ours, and the devil tempting us to all our evil deeds, who then but God can be originally responsible for all the sin and criminality interwoven with our daily lives?

But with this proposition I am well aware my Christian friends cannot agree. To shift the responsibility of evil on a strictly immaculate God would enable man to escape eternal damnation; the sting of their imaginary hell would drop from the scourge of the priests, and lo! their useless calling would vanish as mist before the sun.

We will next assume that God did not create the devil. Why, certainly not! How miserably stupid in us literal Liberals to advance such an absurd idea! The devil, then, is self-created. By some mysterious hocus pocus he suddenly sprang into existence, duly panoplied in all his infernal attributes, the supreme and daring foe of the most high, the deathless enemy of all mankind! Let us for a moment contemplate his luminous majesty as, vaulting upon the throne he so triumphantly occupies, his terrible visage gleaming with a perfect halo of resplendent horror, he surveys the magnificent stage on which in all the future ages he is to play so prominent a role! Is he not an edifying object, my Christian friends, especially when we bear in mind that the sole end and aim of his infernal existence is to torture human souls?

There is one little drawback, however, to the admission that the devil is self-created. In doing so we must emphatically allow him to be the peer as well as antagonist of omnipotence, thus robbing the supreme being of his grand prerogativ as absolute ruler and creator of the universe.

Or again, in allowing the existence of a personal and essentially Jewish Jehovah, it will be seen that such a being as the devil instantly becomes an impossibility. Dwelling in space, presumably limitless, the eternal antagonist of God, the power and glory of deity constantly menaced, can we harbor such an incongruous idea even for a moment? Assuredly not. To render unto God the full measure of glorious reverence we must imperativly renounce all belief in the existence of a long-tailed devil, and any or all of his assistant imps. In the vast universe of nature there is no room for such utterly useless beings; no room for any being that by an inexorable law is incapable of progressing and improving, morally and spiritually, with the lapse of time. Let the devil idea, then, become obsolete; hell ditto. Thus only can we hav mental quietude and happiness here below. We are no longer tortured with morbid doubts and cowardly fears. By degrees we grasp the comprehensiv idea that God, to be truly a god, must be supremely the spirit of consistency, beneficence, and love. The gloom and irrational fears of hell are dispelled. Nature and reason resume their healthful sway, and our bark of life glides peacefully into a haven of tranquility and repose. Were we to pursue the subject further, it might be pertinently asked how a material flame of fire and brimstone can torture, or in any manner affect, an immaterial spirit, which the human soul must undoubtedly be. A moment's reflection, however, will convince any intelligent mind how utterly incongruous the idea is without further amplification. I hav only pity and contempt for those who cannot see that an inexorable law of nature cannot be annihilated even by the potent fiat of a priest.

Let us, then, do our full duty here in this world. Why render our lives hopelessly miserable by persisting in superstition? We hav been by far too long under priestly rule. As for myself, I am henceforth and forever free.

D. T. Ross.

Philosophy on the Half-Shell.

THE SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCES FOR AND AGAINST SPIRITUALISM.

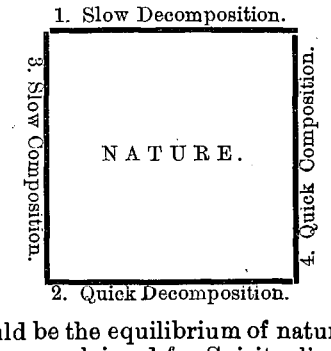
In the present paper I propose to examin the scientific evidences for and against Spiritualism (or Spiritism), together with the weight that such evidences should hav in deciding for or against a possible immortality.

First, let me say that at this present writing I am neither a convert to, nor an opponent of, the doctrin of a future life, since, in my opinion, the evidences in hand are insufficient to warrant either conclusion.

Nine hundred and ninety-nine lies do not invalidate, necessarily, one truth; nor does the imposture of nine hundred and ninety-nine false mediums invalidate the evidence of one genuin medium (assuming that such exists).

Be Spiritualism true or false, let it be remembered that there would inevitably be the same broad array of impostors in the field. Hence let the above fact hav its full and just weight in influencing your judgment. Let us, then, sweep away the vast array of charlatans, and examin that which remains, if anything.

The main evidences (scientific) of Spiritualism rest upon the alleged reality of the phenomena technically termed "Materialization," or (as I prefer to designate it) "quick composition;" that is to say, the gathering together into a concrete form the various elementary particles necessary to form any object, either animate or inanimate.



This process usually takes place instantaneously (or, at all events, quite rapidly), and hence is, in this particular, essentially different from its opposit, "slow composition," or growth, with which we are all familiar.

May not "materialization" ("quick composition"), then, be logically considered as constituting, from this point of view, of the heretofore incomplete square, of which, until the advent of Spiritualism, we had but three sides?

THE FOURTH SIDE

1. "Slow decomposition" (or decay).
2. "Quick decomposition" (or fire).
3. "Slow composition" (or growth).
4. "Quick composition" (or materializ ation).

Thus would be the equilibrium of nature preserved.

The evidences claimed for Spiritualism, second in value to "materialization," rest upon what is termed "independent slate-writing."

This consists in causing marks, letters, or even long and lucid messages, to appear between two slates, firmly tied, locked, or screwed together, said slates being oftentimes brought and handled only by the investigator, the medium being simply permitted to rest his or her hand lightly upon the upper surface of the uppermost slate (the pair being placed, fastened firmly together, upon the table, in full day or gaslight, the investigator, and frequently other witnesses, being present). A small piece of slate-pencil is sometimes inclosed between the two slates before securing them. Frequently, however, the spirits (if such they be) produce marks or writing without the pencil.

The late Professor Carl Frederick Zoellner (who has been called "the Sir William Thompson of Germany"), and who, at the time of his death in 1882, filled the chair of physical astronomy in the university of Leipsic, was one of the first scientific men of Europe, and the author of numerous renowned and valuable treatises.

He (in conjunction with several of his learned confrères) devoted a considerable portion of nearly every day, for several consecutiv weeks, to the scientific and crucial investigation and examination of many of the leading phenomena of Spiritualism (including both "materialization" and "independent slate-writing"), through the mediumship of the celebrated American medium, Dr. Slade, the result being Professor Zoellner's apparently complete conversion to the tenets of "the new philosophy of immortality."

He subsequently published, in extenso, a full and detailed account of these experimental seances (all occurring in broad daylight, and at the house of Professor Zoellner), and which took place through Dr. Slade's mediumship.

This philosophical treatis (for it merits that title) has been republished, copiously illustrated, in this country, by Messrs. Colby and Rich, booksellers, Boston, Mass., under the title of "Transcendental Physics." It should be read by all, being, as it is, the most conclusiv documentary evidence which has yet appeared in favor of Spiritualism.

Numerous other eminent men hav become firm believers in its tenets, among whom I may mention the renowned Professor Crookes, Fellow (at one time president) of "The Royal Society." The names of Edmunds, Hare, Mapes, Varley, Wallace, and many more might, likewise, be cited.

A person of fair reasoning powers cannot fail to be, for the most part, convinced, after a careful review of the entire subject (including, of course, a close study of Professor Zoellner's treatis), that the experiments recorded are not always ascribable to the imposture or stupidity of either mediums or investigators.

Imposture, on the part of the medium, in such a series of scientifically conducted experiments as those of Professor Zoellner, while not absolutely impossible, is, in a very high degree, improbable; I should say not equally that of 1 in 1,000,000.

The veracity of such men as Zoellner and his coadjutors is unimpeachable and above reproach.

Setting aside, then, as untenable, the pet theories of conjuring and of false testimony sufficing, in all cases, to explain away alleged phenomena, we find ourselvs (if the possibility of the truth of Spiritualism be denied) driven to a choice between the two horns of a dilemma. Either medium or investigator, or the two combiued, produce the phenomena.

Now, be it remembered, the chief chemical constituents which go to make up the human (or any animal or vegetable substance) all exist, in a highly attenuated state, in the common atmospheric air which we breathe, and by which we are at all times surrounded.

It is, therefore, entirely possible that these substances may be precipitated (or "materialized"), i. e., condensed into likenesses of the animal (including man), vegetable, and even mineral bodies, by some occult force or forces.

It is also possible that a part, or all the participants in the seance, including the medium, may be psychologized, or mesmerized, to that extent that the various alleged phenomena appear to occur without, in reality, taking place. The facts, however, that quite conclusiv proofs of their occurrence are frequently (as in Professor Zoellner's experiments) claimed by reliable persons, to exist long after the conclusion of the seances (years after, perhaps), sometimes in the shape of locks of hair, cut from the heads of "materialized" spirits, flowers received from their hands, etc., should hav much weight in discrediting the probability of the correctness of this supposition. These "Spirit relics" are, likewise, visible (long after being obtained from the shadowy visitants) by persons who were not present at the seance, and who could not, therefore, be reasonably supposed to be laboring under an hallucination regarding their (the relics') reality.

In considering the purport of alleged messages and communications from the spirit-world, the channel through which they are received, and by which they may be unconsciously tinctured, should not be overlooked; nor the fact that malicious or untruthful spirits may be the communicating intelligencies.

The condition of the mind always corresponds to to that of the brain, its organ, exactly, and in every particular—weakening with it in age and the nearer approach of death.

By a properly delivered blow upon the head, a man may be rendered unconscious during many hours, finally to return to intelligence and earth-life.

During the period of his stupor, caused by the blow, his mind was a complete blank.

Had the blow been but a little heavier, he must hav died, his body returning, through "slow decomposition" (if interred) to parent earth.

Does it not appear probable, looking only at these facts, that when the body (including the brain, which is the organ of the mind) returns to the elements, from which so recently it emerged for a brief space, the mind, too, perishes as an individuality?

Candor compels an affirmativ answer.

Mr. Andrew Jackson Davis, America's greatest seer, in his very remarkable volume, entitled, "Nature's Divine Revelations," which all should read, discusses most ably and fully this and kindred subjects.

In that volume is contained the fullest and most satisfactory scientific and logical refutation of the doctrins of the Materialist ever written.

("Make a note of it," friend Winter.)

All should familiarize themselvs with its pages who would know the full strength of the spiritual hypothesis.

In it the now well-nigh universally accepted theory of evolution was promulgated more than a quarter of a century ago, that system being, in most respects, identical with Mr. Davis's philosophy, as set forth in "Nature's Divine Revelations," "The Great Harmonia," and others of this seer's grand philosophical works, which by many years preceded that famous text-book of evolution—Darwin's "Descent of Man."

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Our London Letter.

Parliament has opened for the autumn session, but for reasons best known to himself Mr. Bradlaugh has not made any attempt to take his seat, preferring to wait until his appeal to a higher court has been decided before claiming the exercise of his legal right to be an activ representativ of the borough for which he has been so often elected. He seems to hav a delicacy as to embarrassing the government, but it would almost seem that he is somewhat too considerate on this point, as he does not find Mr. Gladstone and the majority of his followers desirous of helping him to obtain and hold his rightful position. The scant assistance and half-hearted support he has had from the government appears to hav done him more injury than the most violent opposition he could hav met, but it remains to be seen whether he will eventually gain anything by his consideration. Certainly he has fought hard and well, and as Parliament has met solely for the purpose of passing the Franchise bill, perhaps it was advisable not to urge his constitutional right at the present time. It is characteristic of the present premier that he does not look upon any question with a favorable eye that does not originate with himself, unless it is absolutely forced upon him, and he certainly never appears by his actions to hav taken any personal interest in this matter.

When Secularists are numerous enough to form a political party, with sufficient strength to influence enough votes to turn the course of an election, they will hav their wants attended to by any governant in office, and meet with a respectful consideration they are not yet in a position to command.

The National Secular Society, of which Mr. Bradlaugh is president, is gaining strength and numbers, and every annual report shows a large increase, of members, far more, proportionately, than any religious body can boast of. If the other Secular societies augmented their forces to the same extent, Secularists would be able to make their influence felt both socially and politically to a degree that might even surprise themselvs. It is really only a question of time for Freethinkers to become the chief party in the state, but it would be desirable that this event should take place sooner rather than later.

It is the opinion of many, even in our own body, both here and in America, that Secularists should steer clear of politics, confining themselvs to destruction of theological superstitions, and not interfering too much with social matters; but I think this is somewhat a mistaken idea, for as a rule Freethinkers possess better balanced intellects than believers in effete creeds, and are therefore better qualified for treating social and political questions in a manner far more conduciv to the happiness and well-being of a people than the ordinary run of legislators, who so often misrepresent their constituents. Whether this would be the case has yet to be decided, for undoubtedly it is the case that some men who are fully alive to the fact that priestcraft is demoralizing and injurious to a community, and do their utmost to free mankind from such a thralldom, are not able to see clearly on any other point, and would only alter the form of slavery instead of abolishing it altogether. Fortunately these are in the minority, and it would not be well that they should be allowed the opportunity of exercising any degree of power.

Mr. Foote has just finished a course of lectures on "The Roots of Christianity," to large and appreciativ audiences. Considerable interest was attached to these discourses from the fact that the "Christian Evidence Society" sent some of its champions to oppose the lecturer. It is needless to say with what result. But nowadays it is a hard matter to fight these priests, as Christianity is so latitudinarian that it is well-nigh impossible to fix any one of its expounders down to what were not so long back considered it "fundamental truths." They are ready to accept evolution, and throw the miracles and "prophecies" overboard, to retain the hold on their followers, to whom they hav to look for their daily bread, and as long as they can secure that they will concede anything you like.

Apostasy.

In former days apostasy seemed to be a word expressiv of the extremest perfidy and treachery toward that sect of religionists from which any individual or leader had seceded. It was expressiv of the deepest disgust, and in the sovereignty of popery it was wont to follow its victim not only with anathemas and curses, but with fire and fagot. In these more Liberal times it conveys the meaning that such apostate having added to his former stock of knowledge, openly avows his change of opinion.

We certainly liv in much happier times, yet there is still a repulsion to such individual, as if he had committed an enormity in seceding from the class of his former thinkers. Their feelings are injured. An apostate from Methodism to Unitarianism or any other religious body to whom he has been attached, generally has full employment for some time to repel the aroused suspicion of cupidity, hypocrisy, or immorality. You are far from being sure of the friendship or protection of your new associates, while you can rely in full assurance on the wrath of the class you hav left. Like an injured porpoise, blood once drawn up on it, and the whole school of porpoises dash upon it with merciless fury.

In my intercourse with many ministers and other "men of God," I hav no doubt the dread of religious retribution is intimidativ with hundreds of the LL.D.'s now occupying lucrativ and popular pulpits. The clergy are far from being all fools, but they are financially wise, and as tradesmen are to be extolled.

Now let us, as Liberal Freethinkers, by all means rise above these petty and malignant feelings and set the world a righteous examples, and avoid berating any friend who thinks he has struck a higher or richer vein of knowledge. Let us as Liberals ever remember that the world is wide—wide enough for us all, and that we are all on the same voyage of discovery of new truths.

The above remarks were prompted by noticing the universal shudder among Materialists and some others at friend Chainey's newly announced belief in Spiritualism. I sincerely commiserate the feelings of poor old Tom Winter. "Oh, the world may change, and change, and change again," said my good old Methodist relativ, "but, thanks to my blessed Jesus, I never, never change."

Liberals sometimes become impatient at the apparent slow progress of Liberalism, but let the following clipping from the New York daily Tribune speak for itself:

"Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe, of Buffalo, in reviewing the past twenty years of his episcopate, said the other day that the increase of impiety and Infidelity is appalling."

Reflecting on friend Chainey's change of thought, I sometimes allow my imagination to range in the possibilities of the future. Now, should it so happen in the course of human events that our friends E. M. Macdonald, Seaver, S. P. Putnam, or Elmina should show symptoms of "caving in," what a universal howl would ring through the atmosphere! For one, I should be inclined to think it a saddening event. We must hav antagonism. Without it there can be no progress. In the battle of thought we hav vanquished the tyranny of orthodoxy, and with the logic of facts, and in the development of natural laws, driven fashionable priesthood to the necessity of entrenching itself within the mummeries of paganism. The battle now exists between Agnosticism and Spiritualism. Liberalism should be, as it were, the flint and steel in the world of thought. It is in the clashing collision of these two unyielding bodies, so to speak, that the illuminating spark of intelligence is evolved.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Another newspaper has come out in favor of Liberalism, and accordingly thrown its banner to the breeze—the Wentworth Bond, Wentworth, Dak., Charles A. Eaton, editor and proprietor. Mr. W. L. Horton is identified with the publication, the gentleman who engaged me to giv three lectures here. We hav had a successful course, large attendance, and "enthusiasm" enough to satisfy even our dear brother Chainey. For one I say, may Brother Chainey meet with plenty of work, success, and happiness in any path he deems it his duty to tread. He is a gifted man, and deserves liberal treatment at the hands of Liberals all over the country. He should be his own judge of the work he wants to do.

Mr. Capel Again.

Last Sunday evening, Mgr. Capel addressed the congregation of the St. Vincent Ferrier church in this city on "Toleration." The lecture was a defense of the Inquisition. His remarks are worth careful noting, as evincing the tendency of the church toward force in matters of faith, and as showing that Catholicism is essentially the same proscribing and tyrannous organization in all climes and countries. Among his pious appeals and roses of rhetoric were these thorns:

"I am not the man to mince matters. I stand here to state what is the truth, and that I will state. There is not a father, widow, mother, or son, who is not bound to protect the home from the iniquity which is without. Fathers, it is your duty to save your children from the iniquitous teachings of the world in which you liv. Is the same not true of your mothers, sisters, and brothers? . . . The holy church is the nation of nations. She raises her hands and says: 'No false teacher for my children.' As the hen gathers her children under her wings to protect them, so does the church, the mistress of God Almighty. . . .

"What will the father do to prevent the ruin of a dear one? Whatever the world does to protect property and honor let him also do. For the protection of a man's faith do all that and more, too. I will imprison, will hang, the man who takes from me my faith. The interest of my faith is above life with me. We protect ourselvs on a ground far above that of property. The church, in her grand faith, has suffered torture. Why should we not be willing to suffer for the mistress of God if necessary? God never deserts his own, God protects his children. You who support the doctrin of the incarnation, watch over the children of the church. Protect them as their mother would protect them from coming danger. The Inquisition exists at this moment. It has its center at Rome. Twelve cardinals hav since 1542 composed the corporation! Twelve godly, God-fearing men. The pope presides over this august body.

"Here is a jury of twelve princes of God Almighty; men of renown. Theirs is no idle task. They sit in judgment upon cases requiring their deliberation. The pope's decision is final. Who would not love to be judged innocent by that body of twelve men of God? That's the Inquisition. I am not affrighted by the events of the past when men speak of the horrors of the Inquisition. They hav read books containing statements which Protestant writers desired should be true. They hav not read the original books. I was flogged when a boy myself. The acts of the ancient Inquisition were no more than the habits of the time. Why, in the days of Elizabeth, should one cross the river Trent, a letter V was burnt into his forehead with a red-hot iron. If they punish for the loss of a life, why should there not be punishment for the loss of faith? The horrors of the Spanish Inquisition were condemned by the pope and article after article was written by him exhibiting his regret for the cruelties there suffered. The Spanish government said it would drive out from its territory every heretic. It was right in supporting the principle of protection to family. It was wrong in the method. Tolerance in religion we ask for. We ask only fair play. There is but one church—that is Jesus Christ. He asks us all to come into his fold. The Inquisition of to-day is one of the greatest blessings with which the church is endowed."

The monsignor is honest in much of this, and possibly in all, if we read between the lines and make allowances for Jesuitical duplicity as practiced by the popes, and their defender, the able Capel himself. Perhaps some pope did condemn the horrors of the Inquisition. Some letters of lament may perhaps be preserved in Catholic archives. It is very easy for that church to produce documents of any kind that may be made desirable by the changes wrought by time. A favorit merciful order of the priests of the Inquisition, when punishing a heretic, was that "no blood be spilled." This meant the stake. So it may be that in giving counsel to the state that heretics be exterminated, a pope deplored the necessity of such wholesale murder; but to prove that the church of Rome ever honestly strove to prevent it, will take a much smarter man than Capel.

Seven years after the establishment of the Inquisition, the fourth council of the Lateran enjoined all kings and rulers to swear an oath that they would exterminate all heretics from their dominions. From that time to the confiscation of the property of the Inquisition (in 1835), the sword of the church was unsheathed. It was not the officers of the state, but learned divines, who discussed the propriety of tearing out the tongues of heretics before they were burnt, that the Christians who were burning them should not be shocked by any blasphemies they might utter. And it was priests, too, who argued for a slow fire for the blasphemers, in order that more time might be given them for repentance. It was Pope Innocent VIII. who gave to Torquemada the title of "Confessor of Sovereigns" to confirm him in the position of Inquisitor-general of Spain, in which he had been established by Queen Isabella. The appointment by Pope Alexander VI. of four colleagues to divide the ecclesiastical power with Torquemada was not because the church wished the persecutions stopped, but because Alexander feared the power wielded by Torquemada might be abused to his own detriment. The complicity of the church in these infamous persecutions is conclusivly shown by the edicts published at the time. Prescott says that "edicts were ordered to be published annually on the first two Sundays in Lent, throughout the churches, enjoining it as a sacred duty on all who knew or suspected another to be guilty of heresy to lodge information against him before the Holy Office; and the ministers of religion were instructed to refuse absolution to such as hesitated to comply with this, although the suspected person might stand in the relation of parent, child, husband, or wife."

To an audience of people ignorant of history, Mgr. Capel may tell his tale of innocence, but in the opinion of the enlightened world he must stand convicted as a falsifier of records. Volumes upon volumes of corroborating testimony hav been printed, and did we not know the brazenness of ecclesiastics, we should wonder at the courage that dared invite the ordeal of comparison between his apologetic words and the hard facts of unimpeachable history.

The Plenary Council.

Even for so close a corporation as the Catholic church, officered by the princes of secret intriguers, the Jesuits, it is difficult to completely hide the purposes of such a council as that at Baltimore. Some of its work is coming out, and the disclosures bode no good for America and American institutions.

On the 20th the council considered the position of the Catholic church on the public school question. The open hostility of the church to our schools is well known, and that hostility is not to be modified, but the question is rather how to make the opposition practically operativ. A Herald reporter has obtained expressions from two attendants at the council upon the subject. One, Bishop McQuaid, of Rochester, a leading exponent of the position of the church on this question, said that "there is no doubt that the action taken by the council will be very positiv and will not only demand that Catholic parents shall send their children to parish schools, but that a division of the school tax be made in every state and city commensurate with the proportion paid by Catholic taxpayers."

Another, whom the reporter describes as a leading member of the council, gave fuller expression to these views, but reached the same conclusion. "It is not," he said, "many years since the columns of the press teemed with articles on the public school question. This has been a source of great annoyance to the leaders of the Catholic church. In nearly every large city in the country a great number of Catholic children attend the public schools. Experience has taught that these children frequently become careless in the duties of their religion and indifferent to the high standard of morality on which the church places so high a value. Her bishops and clergy sternly advocate the daily catechism and stated instructions on the principal tenets of the Catholic faith. To bring about this result parish schools hav been attached to many churches, where the poorer children are educated. But Catholics are crippled by the want of pecuniary resources, and thus it happens that in some instances these parish schools are inferior in their curriculum to the public schools of our country. The bishops see that the only way for them to secure a thorough disciplining of the children according to Catholic belief and practice is to establish a more thorough system of parish schools in every city, the studies being graded on the same plan as the primary, grammar, and high school courses of the country. For this purpose they demand such a division of the school tax as will enable them to place their schools on a level with the public schools. What means can be adopted for the accomplishment of this plan is a problem to be solved by the wisdom of the fathers of the Plenary Council of Baltimore."

There is no use trying to ignore this fight with the Catholic church. It is bound to come, and within a short time. The wonderful expansion of the church's power through increase by immigration and the birth rate has made the Romish organization bold and arrogant. In fifty years it has developed from half a million of believers to nearly eight millions. Already over twenty-five hundred parochial schools, with half a million scholars, are established, eighty-seven colleges, five hundred and ninety-nine academies, besides twenty-two ecclesiastical seminaries, and a number of institutions for sacerdotal training, in various religious orders. These are now supported by Catholics. It is one of the aims of this council to saddle the cost upon the general public. Years ago this fight came up in this state. About 1840 the Catholics made a determined effort to obtain for schools supported by religious denominations a share in the school moneys. It was no innovation, for it had been done years before, and had been abandoned because a Baptist church had practiced fraud to obtain a larger share than its school was legitimately entitled to. The Catholics petitioned the common council of this city without success. An application to the legislature found the candidates of both political parties pledged to oppose the Catholics. The latter then nominated a ticket of their own. The question was then between secular and religious schools. The public school party won, and our state laws were made against religious instruction, as cited by Superintendent Ruggles in his late decision on this question. But the Catholics did not giv up the fight; they wanted money for Catholic schools, the Protestants wanted the schools to conform in religious teaching to their notion. The result was a draw. Thurlow Weed for the Protestants, and Hughes for the Catholics, patched up a compromise. They took that portion of the Bible which has no doctrinal bias, and which was to be read without note or comment, so both got Christianity without sectarianism. In 1851 a law to this effect was put on the statute books, and is cited by our board of education to sustain them in reading the Bible in the schools, notwithstanding the positiv order of Mr. Ruggles forbidding it.

Now this contest is to be renewed. The plenary council is to decide how it shall be conducted. The object is to divide the school money up among the sects, and place education in the hands of the church. This purpose is plainly declared. If the Protestant denominations stand firm it can never be done. But will they? Forty-four years ago, to thwart the Catholics, they stood for secular schools. There were then but few Freethinkers, and no Freethought organizations. The church itself was not menaced with dissolution. Now the danger to Catholicism is from the Freethinkers, and the danger from that source is equally great to the Protestants. Will not the two great sects unite and divide the school money among the anointed that the common enemy may be checked in its progress? There is, every one admits, a large element of absolute Infidelity within the Protestant church, but just how large no one knows. The voting Freethinkers would be powerless before the voting Catholics unless re-enforced by the silent Infidelity of the churches. We must concede that. The questions, then, are,(1) Will the Protestants stand as they stood forty years ago? and (2) if not, how largea force is there in this country that will come to the front when the issue is made?

The first of these questions, we think, must be answered in the negativ. There are not wanting indications of a disposition on the part of both churches to unite to resist the spread of Freethought. Some of the leading men of both sects hav expressed themselvs to this effect. Writers for papers and magazines of Catholic and Protestant proclivities hav agreed that the union must come. The American Evangelical Alliance was formed by the Protestants in 1867 principally to combat Infidelity; and they welcome the help of Catholics to sustain the fundamental positions of Christianity. A book written by a Catholic to "answer" America's greatest living Infidel has been circulated as widely by Protestants as by Catholics. In the attempt, last December, of the Catholics at Doylestown, Pa., to obtain a share of the school money for their parochial school, Protestant help was freely, though not unitedly, extended. The petition of the Catholics was mostly signed by their sectarian opponents, and only a state law prevented the grant being made. These facts, and strong opinions from eminent churchmen which we hav not room to quote, convince us that the Protestants will not by any means oppose a united front to the foe of republican institutions.

The second question is unanswerable. The numbers of Freethought are uncounted. And not only uncounted, but on this subject uneducated. But few of the outspoken Freethinkers, even, are awake to the machinations of the church. It is, therefore, the duty of every one who recognizes the danger in which this country would be placed by such division of the school funds, and consequent destruction of our public school system, to arouse the apathetic, and to resist in every honorable way the efforts of Catholic priests to get grants of money from local authorities to aid their parochial schools.

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

Editorial Notes.

In addition to having a Freethought member in Parliament (though illegally deprived of his seat by the Christians), Northampton now has a Freethought mayor in the person of Thomas Adams, one of Mr. Bradlaugh's oldest and most valued friends.

At the school board election for the Parish of Humberstone, near Leicester, England, placards were published with the intention of injuring the candidature of Mr. Gimson, bearing the words: "Do not vote for the Infidel." The result of this was that Mr. Gimsom was returned by a good majority. At the Brighton school board election, Mr. Henry Prince, a thorough Secularist, was elected second on the poll, with 5,275 votes, although his opponents used the cry of "Atheist" very strongly against him throughout the election struggle.

Freethought is invading Ireland. Some of Colonel Ingersoll's lectures are being distributed to emigrants, which causes the priests much pain. We really hope such emigrants as can read will take these lectures on shipboard with them, and by their perusal become enlightened enough when they reach these shores to refuse to do the political bidding of Cardinal McClosky through his nephew, John Kelly, and Tammany Hall. We already hav in this land a sufficient number of what Frank Pixley with more truth than politeness calls the "Pope's Irish."

The Banner of Light, which, without disparagement to the rest except one, is by long odds the best Spiritualistic paper published, takes the same view as The Truth Seeker of the once proposed meeting of Messrs. Watts and Chainey. It says: "The Chainey-Watts debate, which was advertised to take place in this city soon, we learn from The Truth Seeker will not occur. It is best that it should not. Liberals cannot afford to expend their ammunition in controversies of the sort contemplated. There is other work for them to do of much more importance to the world at large than opening a mental sparring exhibition."

In the last number of the National Reformer, Mr. Bradlaugh says that "those who hav read on the one hand the fulminations of the pope of Rome against all Freemasons as Atheistic societies, and on the other the declarations of the Grand Lodge of England against the Grand Orient of France, because in the revision of its constitution the latter has erased all religious declarations and has abolished all religious tests, may be interested in learning that it is very possible that the Grand Orient of France may take an early opportunity of appealing to English public opinion against the harsh action of the Grand Lodge of England, and of explaining the true position of European Freemasonry. It is posible that this may be first done at some great public meeting to be held in London.'

Quoting our remark that outside of the religious press the violent opposition to the League is narrowed down to a free religious, a free love, and a free property journal, Mr. Tucker observes in his Liberty, "It is not the first time that extremes hav met in a good cause. Liberty would make this trio a quartet, had she leisure for such gentle and amusing sport." Liberty must be a very busy female, for there is at least one other thing which she has no time to attend to. Some few weeks ago we saw an attempt on her part to expound what we may call the constructiv side of anarchy; which attempt, in our opinion, had serious logical defects, which we respectfully pointed out. The busy Liberty had paused long enough in her labor to tell a correspondent what anarchy is, and we wanted to know why pantarchy wasn't a more logical anarchistic sociology than anarchy itself. And now as Liberty has the good sense to not turn aside and abuse the League, cannot she find time to answer the conundrums propounded by The Truth Seeker of Oct. 4th?

The Lackawanna Democrat in its last issue has these pleasant words to say about the lithograph of the monument, and The Truth Seeker itself: "One of the finest monuments ever seen in this country has recently been erected to the memory of D. M. Bennett, founder of that able advocate of Freethought, The Truth Seeker, in Greenwood Cemetery, New York. One thousand friends of the dead journalist, admirers of his sterling qualities and the beauty of thought, goodness of heart, and the self-abnegation which distinguished his life, contributed to the fund by which this magnificent memorial was erected. A colored lithograph of this beautiful memorial has just reached us. In reality it is a present that is appreciated more than cold words can express. Besides a view of the monument there is a fine likeness of Mr. Rennett and a landscape scene, which embraces a large portion of Greenwood Cemetery. On the monument are engraved many of the famous utterances of the departed Liberal, as well as the record of his life and the work to which many years of his activ manhood were devoted. The Truth Seeker perpetuates the fame of its founder by this truly generous act, and while accepting its generosity with thanks, it is but just and proper that we should add our testimony to that of thousands of others who hav many times declared that as an advocate of Freethought, free speech, and all that is ennobling in nature, The Truth Seeker has no superior in the universe."

Lectures and Meetings.

Messrs. Watts and Putnam will speak at Stamford, Conn., Friday evening, the 28th.

Col. Ingersoll lectured at Pope's Theater, St. Louis, last Sunday, on "Which Way?"

J. E. Remsburg will lecture in Montreal next month. He will be heard, if Father Chiniquy was not.

J. H. Burnham will lecture in Dean's Opera House, Adrian, Mich., on Nov. 30th, morning and evening. Subject in the morning, at 10 o'clock, "State Secularization." Evening meeting at 7 o'clock, subject, "Reason or Rome."

Mr. Green writes us that, in addition to the speakers previously advertised to be at Salamanca, he has assurances from Mr. T. B. Wakeman that he will attend. Mr. George W. Taylor will also be there, and if Courtlandt Palmer cannot occupy the chair will be asked to preside.

Amid the booming of cannon and the glare of bonfires, I began my course of six lectures in Seward, Neb. Politics, uncertainty as to which nominee was chosen to fill the presidential chair, the inability of the mighty public, made our venture rash. Notwithstanding, the pluck, the persistence of the Liberals of Seward made the series of six lectures a success. But there was not the jam which I had here five years this very month at some of the fourteen then given. When one has once stirred the thought of a community, he is rarely forgotten. Hence I found awaiting me here many warm friends, among whom the visitor feels at home. The enthusiastic veteran of Freethought in Seward is Mr. H. L. Boyes, who is seventy-three years old, but declares that is "just as young as he used to be." Everybody here resp ts Bro. Boyes, saint and worldling alike. Mrs. Boyes, toward seventy, is a woman of wonderfully clear thought. I was welcomed to their home, and there I worked and talked for a week. Nearly every day Friend Boyes harnessed his horse and treated the writer to a carriage ride. We made "pastoral calls" upon the brethren and sisters of the Liberal congregation. There are many more whose names I hav not been able to obtain. Seward is the stronghold of Liberalism in the state of Nebraska. Most of the Liberals are outspoken, but a few prefer their Liberalism mild. I hav a call to return here in January.—W. F. Jamieson.

The energetic chairman of the League's executiv committee put in a busy day last Sunday, lecturing in Newark in the afternoon, and New York in the evening. A lowering sky which began to send down rain about half an hour before the time for speaking kept many of the Newark Liberals at home, and the hall was only half full when Mr. Reynolds began his discourse on "What Liberalism Teaches." Those who were present, however, enjoyed themselvs thoroughly for the hour the speaker kept them, especially the ladies. Mr. Reynolds appreciates woman in the abstract and concrete, and a good portion of his remarks were pleas for her rights and an entreaty to the members of the Leagues to enlist her in their work. In introducing Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Mayo, president of the League, paid a handsome compliment to the Liberals he met at the New York sociable who were stirring up the smoldering flames of Freethought, and at the conclusion Mr. Avery entertained the audience with some wise remarks. Next Sunday Dr. T. A. Lambert will lecture before the League on "Respiration and Digestion." His points will be illustrated with diagrams and a skeleton.

By the time Mr. Reynolds arrived in this city the rain was coming down in torrents, and the wind blowing at the rate of twenty miles an hour. Notwithstanding this, the Liberal Club hall was fairly well filled by some of New York's best Liberal citizens to hear the reasons why the chairman of the executiv committee left the pulpit. Courtlandt Palmer presided. In introducing the lecturer he made a five-minute speech in which he likened the League officers to the knights of old who took their lives and fortunes in their hands and went forth to do battle for their faith. In starting out as a Liberal propagandist or missionary Mr. Reynolds was taking the whole risk upon himself, and such enthusiastic devotion was as knightly as any deed of arms performed by the besiegers of the so-called holy city. On coming forward to the desk Mr. Reynolds plunged at once into his subject, and in an hour and five minutes had given the people reasons enough for leaving twenty pulpits, could he hav occupied so many at once. The lecture was voted exceedingly able by those of the audience who are or pretend to be critics, and the rest were highly pleased, following the speaker with silent eagerness, and expressing their appreciation with loud applause at the close. Mr. Wakeman asked the audience to remember that hall rents had to be paid, and sent a venerable member of the Liberal Club around with a hat, during which satisfactory proceeding he philosophized on the disagreeable necessity of iconoclastic work, and expressed his hope that soon the Liberals could devote their whole time and energy to construction—to replacing that which they had torn down with an edifice of which humanity should be the sole tenant, in which no god of superstition could find a lodgment, and which should always be open to the poor, the oppressed, and those religiously hungry, the foundations of which were science, liberty, and justice. At half-past nine the audience went out into the rain, conscious of having done their duty in coming out and of having been repaid for doing it.

Canadian Notes.

On Sunday before last J. Ick Evans lectured in Albert Hall on the "History of Christianity." On Sunday last Phillips Thompson occupied the same platform with one of his popular themes entitled, "The Decline of Orthodoxy." On Sunday morning last a fifth debate on the subject of Max Nordau's Book, "The Lies of Civilization," came off at the Grand Opera House Building. The science class meets every Tuesday, and the elocution class every Friday evening.

The Toronto Daily Mail, of Nov. 6th, says: "If there be a minister of the gospel who believes in his heart that Christianity is sweeping all before it, just now, his horizon must be bounded by his own devout parish. There never was a time when religion had a weaker grasp upon the world. It is not alone that its enemies are strong beyond any parallel, or previous record, but that it is steadily losing its status among Christians."

The central executiv of the "Canadian National Secular Society" are assiduously at work on the preparations necessary for the successful carrying out of the great convention in Albert Hall on the 13th of December, for Secularists from all parts of the dominion of Canada. The various committees hav been struck—each one of whom has its own particular duties to perform. No effort will be spared to render the "Great Convention" a great success.

A leading Canadian paper remarks everybody knows, and none better than the clergy, that doubt, incredulity, and skepticism swarm, even before the altar of God, and that religion is becoming more and more loose and attenuated. And what of the prospect outside the church? The intellect of the age is in rebellion against the Christian dogmas. In England, France, Germany, and the United States, science has become the instrument of what has been well called an all-corroding, all-dissolving skepticism.

The "Great Convention" of Secularists held in Albert Hall, Toronto, in the year 1875, went off with great eclat. A second "Great Convention" in 1877, was also a success; but the central executiv are determined that the convention of 1884 shall outshine all its predecessors.

The Toronto Daily Mail has the following: "The magazines and reviews of the present day are openly skeptic. Beecher, who preaches an easier religion every fall, and the apostles of blasphemy, are the people's favorits. The only Christian minister who 'draws' on the rostrum is Talmage, and that not so much because he delivers the good old evangel, as because his manner of delivering it is grotesque, and his methods absurd. The tendency of the trained intellect of the present day, despite the testimony of revelation for two thousand years, is to revolt against the belief in the immortality of the soul, and the existence of a first cause; and to reject flatly and defiantly every doctrin within the Christian sanctuary. The signs of the times are that the world is about to witness the driving from the earth of almost the last vestige of revealed faith. The tremendous deluge of skepticism is shaking the whole fabric of the church." R. B. Butland.

Nov. 22, 1884.

Salamanca Convention, Dec. 4th to 7th.

This bids fair to be one of the most important, interesting, and enjoyable meetings ever held in the state, exceeding even that of last year. Extra efforts should be made by all working Liberals, women and men, to attend. Messrs. Watts and Putnam, the able and experienced organizers, and devoted exponents of secularization, will be in attendance to aid by their counsel and lay before the convention the broad plans of the board of directors of the National Liberal League.

This will be the only meeting in New York state at which they can be present, as they go from Salamanca to Canada to attend the great convention at Toronto, and after a month's Canadian tour, proceed direct on their route West, and will not return until late in the spring.

If we would make real advancement; if we desire the success of Freethought and the Secularization of our government, let us remember, the golden key to future advancement is the proper use of present opportunities. All admit our only consistent course is to use every possible endeavor to bring the light of truth before the people. Enjoyable as will be this gathering, that is the least of its claims for all to attend. The larger number present, the more fully will the meeting be reported by the press. Thousands will read the account of the convention. A curiosity is thus aroused to know what are the demands of Liberalism. People begin to think; and once honest men and women think for themselvs, old blind faith dies.

It is desirable that delegations from every part of the state attend; so that not alone local Leagues may be multiplied, but we may decide how best the social element may be so interwoven with the educational as to insure the enthusiastic cooperation of the women, without which success is hopeless.

We need to hav little gatherings in every school district that shall form a nucleus around which all honest hearts can rally, in which our mothors, sisters, wives, and children shall all delight to participate, where the weak and timorous shall gain strength and courage, and that shall be a living refutation to the malignant slanders and misrepresentations of the clergy that Liberalism is all of vice and evil.

Come for earnest consultation, free interchange of views, and determination that, having found the best method, to return home and put it in vigorous operation. Remember Mr. Green says there will be no collections, and no money called for. Come one, come all. C. B. Reynolds.

Letters from Friends.

LOWELLVILLE, O., Nov. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The long and tedious articles of Harrison and Spencer, published lately in THE TRUTH SEEKER, hav been read by me with a good deal of interest, as well as a good deal of disappointment. The main point in controversy has been, The Religion of the Future—What will It be? Mr. Spencer claiming that it will be the worship of the Unknowable, and Mr. Harrison that it will be the worship of Humanity. And they hav both succeeded quite well, as it seems to me, in demolishing each other's theory, and remind me of the drunken man who, after running a race with his own shadow, said it was a "damned tie." Mr. Harrison, however, givs it up, and it remains to be seen what Mr. Spencer will do. Mr. Harrison says: "I am ready to giv up the word 'worship,' if that is a stumbling-block, and to speak of showing affection and reverence. If people mean by religion going down on their knees, and invoking a supernatural being, I will wait till the word 'religion' has lost these associations." Again, Mr. Harrison says: "The very purpose of the positiv scheme is to satisfy rational people that, though the ecstatic 'worship' of supernatural divinities has come to an end, intelligent love and respect for our human brotherhood, will help us to do our duty in life." And again he says: "In plain words, the religion of Humanity means recognizing your duty to your fellow-man on human grounds."

Now, this is certainly giving up the matter in controversy by Mr. Harrison, for neither religion nor worship means "love and respect for our human brotherhood;" and "recognizing your duty to your fellow-man on human grounds," is not religion at all. And this is admitted by Mr. Harrison himself when he says, "If people mean by religion going down on their knees and invoking a supernatural being, I will wait till the word 'religion' has lost these associations." Yes, wait till the word religion has lost its present meaning; wait till it means something that will suit Mr. Harrison's theory; wait a thousand or a million of years until the meaning is changed, but allow Mr. Harrison to adopt the future meaning now in order to save his theory, which has been demolished by Mr. Spencer. It will not do, and the theory must go. Yes, both theories were shown to be "from no sense."

ONCONTA, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER (nearly every copy) from the first paper issued by our honored and lamented friend, D. M. Bennett, though from my itinerant habits, I hav been obliged to procure it through your agencies and newsdealers most of the time, as I had no permanent address to which I could hav it sent. I am in hopes, however, to settle here, and as soon as I do, will hav it sent directly from the publication office. Of course, in its treatment of the multitude of subjects that come under its consideration, and from so many minds, there are ideas offered occasionally which I cannot accept, neither is to be expected of any of its readers, for, if it did, it would cease to be the grandest of Liberal papers, and sink itself to the level of ordinary church and partisan journals. I do not think THE TRUTH SEEKER has ever claimed infallibility—that plea is only set up by one of the most bigoted of the Christian denominations—still I cannot agree with Mr. Joseph Anthony, that "it is not a wise teacher," and I believe most of your readers will agree with me that it is in verity a truth seeker in deed as well as name; always seeking light from every source, whether scientific, historical, or the needs and aspirations of humanity. I was particularly interested in the remarks of Mr. J. L. Andrew in last week's issue, about the superstition and bigotry exhibited in our sister state, Texas, as they fully accord with my own experience there but a few weeks since. But there are a few noble spirits at work for the "cause of humanity," even in the Lone Star state, and I am convinced, with Mr. Andrew, that Liberalism will yet "save Texas," and I know of no one who is doing more to break the shackles of mental bondage than Mr. Shaw, of Waco, with whom I am personally acquainted, and know something of the taunts and hardships he has had to endure. Speed the cause, and all honor to our noble workers who, with vestigia nulla retrorsum as their watchword, are pressing forward slowly but surely to victory. ADDISON ELLSWORTH.

HOOPER, UTAH, Oct. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Are the anti-vivisectors all cranks, or crazy, or what's the matter with them, anyhow? Has not Dr. Foote as much right to write a poem to THE TRUTH SEEKER as Mr. Elliott Preston? If not, why not? That is a question I should like the anti-vivisectors to answer.

I hav read everything in THE TRUTH SEEKER for six years, read two numbers over nine years ago, and I may date my conversion from theological darkness into the light of scientific truth to those two little sheets of D. M. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER, because they set me to thinking. The only thing I ever saw to condemn in the paper founded by the martyr of liberty in this our day was the illustration of Elliott Preston's "Vivisector's Death-Bed." This seemed to me very objectionable, for, in my opinion, if Mr. Preston will take the trouble to investigate Mr. Bergh's vivisector's death and his vision, he will find, I believe, that it is the say-so of some theological quack or doctor of divinity. The next time Mr. Preston gets up an illustration of the ghosts of dead horses, dogs, etc., for THE TRUTH SEEKER, he will be an eye-witness of the matter, and giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER facts, in place of myths, or the ravings of a Christian maniac upon his deathbed. If the anti-vivisectors are in real earnest to prevent suffering to animals, let them turn their efforts to man, or rather to woman. The most horrible, excruciating pains known to humanity are experienced at childbirth. 'Tis then that the aid of the vivisector's knowledge becomes useful and beneficial, as every mother will tell you. At that time the laying on of the elder's hands is not worth anything. In my opinion, these horrible pains of our mothers, wives, and sisters are experienced, in nine families out of ten, all over the earth, about three times more than they should be for the welfare of humanity. Use your talents in teaching mothers and wives to curtail human production on such an extensiv scale.

The teachings of theology, that where God sends mouths he sends food and clothes, is a manifest lie, as is plain to be seen in every city and town on the earth. From whence come all your paupers, gutter-snipes, jail-birds, drunkards, libertins, and prostitutes? In a word, over-population in the family—more backs than coats, more stomachs than food. This is the real evil of the age, even in monogamic countries, and its evil effects are a thousand-fold more manifest in polygamic countries, like Turkey or the United States, for this must be a polygamic country, if I am to believe Mr. Stillman and other cranks who write on the Mormon question, who know nothing about it.

The Mormon priesthood compels every Liberal Christian (and as D. M. Bennett said: "In Utah a Jew is a gentile,") to pay taxes to build Mormon churches under the pretext of (Mormon) district school-houses. Every week Mormonism is taught in them, and that alone. They are built by the taxation of all, and none but Mormons hav any right in them at all. In fact, I hav known Liberals in this, the sixteenth school district, County of Davis, Utah, by petition to the Mormon trustees, to beg for part of our rights, viz., that the Liberal party of Hooper, which is the Freethinkers, having the same objects as the National Liberal League, might hav the school-house one night a week, and one Sunday night a month. We would furnish our own coal-oil and coal, and pay for all damages, if any. This is their reply:

"Before any Infidel, Spiritualist, or gentile shall read, lecture, or debate in our meeting-house, we would see it burnt to the ground." Then recollecting their instructions from the holy priesthood, they added: "It is rented to the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints for six dollars a year, excepting the time when occupied as a Mormon day school." There are millions of dollars of Mormon church property in temples and palaces; tens of thousands of church sheep and horned stock, all exempt from taxation. They hav chaplains wherever they can place them—paid out of the public crib. I appeal to every Liberal. Is it consistent to offer aid and comfort to such a base, infamous organization as Mormonism, which strikes at the very roots of a republican government? And is Mormonism to be shielded and protected because its adherents claim it is their religion to lie, steal, and murder in the name of God; and seduce and liv in polygamy, adultery, and incest in the name of Jesus Christ, and by virtue of the holy priesthood sealed upon them in the sink-holes of iniquity called temples and endowment houses?

If the Mormons hav the right, under the pretext of religious belief, to practice every evil known to man, every other church in the land has the same right. If their leaders and disciples set up the same pretext as Mormons and cranky Liberals, then it follows as a consequence that every sect hav the right to violate the laws of the land, because it is their religion to do so; and I claim the demands of Liberalism are inconsistent; that there is no grand principle at stake; that there is no issue between Liberalism, or Freethought, and old superstitious theology. I concede the right to every man, woman, and child in the universe to believe anything and everything; but the right of every crank to practice every crime they choose because it is their religious belief, I deny. Think of Guiteau, Freeman, Comstock, Brigham Young, J. D. Lee, and thousands of others. It was their religious belief that impelled them to all their monstrous crimes. Suppose some of the wise men of the East, if they hav a beautiful daughter they love more than life or gold, upon her wedding-day, instead of the idol of her heart, let the priesthood select four or five husbands, and they all marry the same maiden on the same day, for if polygamy is right, so is polyandry. Let the Mormon advocates in the East introduce it where they dwell, if it is right for them to practice their religious belief. Then, possibly, they will find out that this octopus of Utah polygamy is not a joke at all. EDWARD F. MUNN, SR.

WEBSTER, MASS., Nov. 13, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Yours in reference to Man and THE TRUTH SEEKER came duly to hand to-day, and I would say that, taking the Investigator, which is so nearly like THE TRUTH SEEKER, and my having more than I ought to read, and also my not being overstocked with cash, I think I cannot afford to take THE TRUTH SEEKER. If I was in as good circumstance as when I was in that old superstitious Methodist church most forty years, and paid about three thousand dollars in there in that time, I would pay four times more than I do now to support the Liberal cause. It seems too bad that out of, I think, one-half of the American men in this town who are with us in belief probably not a dozen take a Liberal paper. They all hav axes to grind, and I seem to be about the only one that dare show my colors. A great many show me the cold shoulder, and all but one of my own family are against me. So you see I hav no help at home to make things pleasant and happy. I was talking with a man yesterday, and he said, "Well, if you don't believe the Bible, I don't want to argue with you." I said, "I can't see any God in it. A good God would not do and say as the Bible represents him to hav done." "Well," said he, "there is enough that is good." I replied, "If God said and did as the Bible says, he is worse than a devil could be, and it shows it is a get-up affair by men, and not very shrewd at that.

I don't see why so many urge people not to pay rents, but to take possession of land they hav not earned, after others hav worked hard and paid for it. I could pay ten times more for the Liberal cause if I had not lost by building houses, and losing so much by shiftless and drunken scamps not paying rent. And I lost six thousand dollars by property going down on my hands. I labored hard about fifty years, sick most half the time; got ten thousand dollars laid up, and built sixteen thousand dollars' worth, now worth ten thousand, and I owe six thousand five or six hundred toward them, and can't get a living out of them by doing all my repairs. I hav run behind for five years, and carried on a small farm most of the time at that. Generally he that lets tenements has to be the slave of his tenants. Yours truly, AMASA WOOD.

AURORA, OHIO, Oct. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is probable that I am as difficult to suit others as well as I am to be suited; but permit me to complain of what occurs so often in Infidel thought and reading. In Ingersoll's late replies in the San Franciscan, published in your last number, was it necessary to say that "Webster was on the side of the bloodhounds?" Is sympathy for the oppressed to be secured only by such cheap and stretched assertions? Must Ingersoll resort to such claptrap to prove his superior humanity? Is there not some mock humanity in elevating himself so much above Webster, or even the great majority of slave-holders? I know not how many hav been bit or chased to their injury by bloodhounds, but I can guess that any day in the city of New York Ingersoll might pass by unnoticed more painful instances of suffering than were ever inflicted by all the bloodhounds that ever hunted slaves in the United States, and that if he did notice them he would reserve his tears to sell lectures with.

Again, Liberals very generally giv great weight to Jefferson's religious views, and his clear and vivid expressions concerning liberty; but they utterly repudiate his political system, by which he proposed to secure liberty to future generations. As to this, they unhesitatingly pronounce him a demagog, and had he lived forty years longer, he would hav deen denounced as a traitor to liberty and a friend of bloodhounds.

More, the walls of Lafayette prison, named from his distinguished associate in France and America, would hav been thick enough to stifle his words, as they hav stilled his acts.

Yours, N. EGGLESTON.

ALKALI, OR., Oct. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: One of your correspondents says, "Poor Chainey! he is surely as 'unstable as water.'" Mr. Charles Watts handles Mr. Chainey with some heavy writing. Others are taunting him from different points of view. I think our Liberals should not forget Liberalism. Remember, a person may be a Materialist and not be a Liberal, or he may be a Spiritualist and not be a Liberal, because the grounds of belief, I think, are yet so circumscribed as not to admit of demonstration. Let all hands say, "I think," oftener. Elmina is quite Liberal toward Mr. Chainey, and is not so bigoted that she cannot investigate. The "poor Chainey" remark given above could not emanate from a Liberal mind. So far as stability is concerned, the most orthodox Christian is the personification of stability so long as he stubbornly and blindly refuses to peep from the darkness that envelops him. I'm afraid Mr. Watts, brilliant as he is, is a little afraid of Spiritualism, because his brilliant course is not so much identified with it as with Materialism. This is not liberality. My remarks are impartial, because I'm not a Spiritualist any more than I'm a Materialist or Christian to the exclusion of any new idea. Remember the fellows who quarreled about the color of the chamelion. We know that Materialism is true until we use it as a term excluding Spiritualism from the list of facts. I ask any one, how do you know Spiritualism is a fallacy? You don't know it. I say to all, Be Liberal. H. S. E.

MILL BROOK, CONN., Nov. 3, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Slenker's investigations seem to hav amounted to but little, and she and Spiritualism apparently stand just where they stood before—Mrs. Slenker not converted; Spiritualism not disturbed. Had she found what she is evidently determined not to find, i. e., evidence of immortality, it would hav been of no consequence to anybody but herself, so far as belief or disbelief in Spiritualism is concerned. As Susan Wixon says in the Investigator, "It will make no difference to believers or non-believers, for in such a matter each person must investigate for himself." The days of faith in revelations made to others are forever past. But Mrs. Slenker is evidently not qualified for the task she undertook. A person who can be imposed upon by so barefaced a trick as that by which Mr. Truesdell produced two of the messages described in Elmina's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 1st is not a fit person to investigate Spiritualism. It appears that Mr. Truesdell was allowed to handle the slates, and was so carelessly observed by Mrs. Slenker that he had a chance to substitute a third slate which he carried under his coat for one of the two examined by Mrs. Slenker. If all investigation were made in that loose way, it would be of very little account. When tests are sought of independent slate-writing, the medium is not allowed to furnish the slates or handle them except under the closest scrutiny.

But Mrs. Slenker did get communications on her own slates which she does not and cannot explain. How does she know they were not produced by spirit power? Simply because Mr Truesdell says so. If he had said they were produced by spirits she would not hav taken his word for it. Why is she so ready to believe him when he says, without furnishing her any proof, that it is a trick? Why? Because she entered into the investigation with a determination not to be convinced; that's why.

It may seem strange to many that any one should wish to hav annihilation proved true, but pride of opinion plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep. This lady has so long asserted that there is no future life that it is as hard for her to giv up her annihilation as it was for the old woman to giv up her "total depravity;" and who, speaking of universal salvation, said "she hoped for better things." So Mrs. Slenker "hopes for better things" than a future life, and has "investigated" with an eye single to the opportunities for not finding anything. Why did she go to Syracuse? That city is not noted for "spirit phenomena," as she would hav us infer, from the heading of her last letter. It would seem that she went there for the express purpose of having Mr. Truesdell help her to not find anything, and in that has succeeded, apparently, to her complete satisfaction; for at the close of her last letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, she makes this curious confession: "If my trip has done ever so little towards proving spirit phenomena and spirit existence impossible, I am more than satisfied."

The result seems to justify and confirm my opinion expressed in a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER while money was being contributed by Spiritualists to defray Mrs. Slenker's expenses, viz., "It is money thrown away to hire people to investigate Spiritualism." I think no Spiritualist, in view of the past, will be anxious to repeat the experiment.

H. W. PINNEY.

CASSADAGA, N. Y., Nov. 13, 1884.

To ELMINA (in search of Spiritualism): I hav carefully read several times your article from Syracuse, N. Y., of Oct. 15th. I believe I hav digested it, so wish to giv you and THE TRUTH SEEKER's readers some facts. First, I will tell you what made me a Spiritualist. When nearly twenty-four years old (I am now past fifty-five), I had my first child die by dropsy of the brain, after four days sickness. He was eighteen months old. I was a Materialist; life and death once to all; I knew no more; I accepted nature as final in death. I used to think, Why cannot I kill myself and see what is, and still be myself? Angels were a myth. This child was my idol, my god, my all. In despair of love, I married by advice of friends; I wanted children; this, in short, was my condition at night after the child's death. In the morning, I looked at the little body that had never gone to sleep at night out from my own arms, and said, I shall never feel my baby's arms again. I never expected to. My husband staid by me till I was settled in bed, there being only a curtain between me and my baby's body in its crib. In about half an hour the room seemed all lighted up; I called, but no one had come in. I settled down quiet and felt my child's form in my arms, his hands upon my neck in the old place, his whole person pressed upon me; quiet, resting, loving peace came to me. My child was right there. By a fact, nature had given me a revelation. I had asked nature all my life, What next, next? and in the hours of need she, by the loving chords that held the child to me, gave me her answer. For three months the child was with me nightly. Then my second child was born. I became a Spiritualist from this experience; I never spoke of it for years. It was my own. I thought raps and table tippings were obtained by some unknown force in the sitters.

In a year or more after this experience, I became what is called a medium; this was a new realm. At first I did not place it in the list as a part of such experience as I here giv, but I was giving facts that made others think their spirit friends controled me, so mediumship became pronounced. It took nearly five years to make me fully sure that the power that made me speak was of spirit source, but I soon believed I saw and felt spirits. Three weeks before my child's death, I dreamed he was taken from me a long distance off; it seemed as though it was an endless road to reach him, but I was traveling after him expecting, sometime, to overtake him. I awoke crying, as I did not cry at his death. That dream was the real parting of death to me.

Now, Elmina, you close your article by saying if your trip has done ever so little toward proving spirit phenomena and existence impossible, you are more than satisfied. Why? You do not seem to hav the least comprehension of what Spiritualism covers. You expose the fact of your succeptibility of control by Truesdell, accepting his statements of facts as reliable. You report him thus. He refuses to giv you the explanation of the trick, lest others learn and delude the credulous. He has already published one book of tricks, and many are using them; has another to publish, and refuses to giv you its contents lest some use it for bad purposes by and by. He publishes (after THE TRUTH SEEKER, by your help, advertises it), then what? Will not the credulous use it? Now, if the majority of spirit investigators had been so easily deluded as you, we never, as Spiritualists, would hav counted by millions. We know there are frauds. What of it? We know the heavens are full of electricity, but we, by induction, control some of it from simple elements. Shall we swear there is no great whole, because we can use lead to store it? We do not damn the telegraph because we use a telephone. The lightnings flash, and winds blow just the same. The eternal verity goes on. We particle out some of it, and liv in it. You found a mud puddle at Truesdell's, and you think you hav crossed the ocean of spirit-fact. Mr. Chainey sat in the door of a tent, next to the one I was in, at a camp-meeting one day here this summer. In the road, about twenty feet from us, a lady and gentleman were stopped in their walk by Mr. Mansfield running after them. They had been to see him and had got some slate writing on their own slates, which they had in their own hands covered with paper taking home. He overtook them and put his hand on the covered slates, and writing was heard from pencil. Several had gathered around, and opening the slates a message was found that was not there when the slates were tied up. Mr. Chainey was a spectator of this manifestation. The owners of these slates know there was no fraud. Truesdell's assertions, backed by you, cannot militate against this form of fact—the experience of tens of thousands. We do not claim one-half of mental phenomena as of spirit origin; it's mortal powers a little more than ordinary.

Two years ago this summer, here at camp, a young lady of veracity, an investigator in this section, called on me; she had just left Charles Watkins's rooms. She had a slate that she had brought with her. With tears that she could not control, she said, "See what I hav. I put my slate into little Claudie's hands (Mr. Watkins's three-year-old boy), and he said he wanted a circle. See this message that came on the slate. The little fellow held it; Mr. Watkins never touched it."

Spiritualism holds its millions by such evidence as I hav given you as my own. It is indelibly a part of nature's primal relation with man. Her underlying fires will never be put out by squirt-gun ignorance or counterfeits. All forces of nature alike are sacred to me. I hav no spirit consciousness different from my bodily. My dead form ready for burial, to me, is as full of intelligence as the form that, separated from it, carries on activities in a positiv way. The one buried carries its affinities and activities in parts to forming life around; is lost as a separate organism; the ethereal or gaseous entity wraps itself anew to act as an organization for long or short. I do not know, but evolution teaches me countless deaths, and the parts that make up the whole as intelligent as the whole; sensation is in parts: its continuities make up life's consciousness.

When I was nineteen years old, being in Lowell, Mass., one summer evening, I saw clearly a person who was in the state of Maine. He appeared clearly before me. It was bright moonlight. He impressed me to feel that he was coming there; and in about two weeks he did. I got this experience of him when he decided to come. I had not met him for eight years. I was in Wisconsin during the third year of my acting as a medium; he appeared to me as a spirit, controled me, said he was dead, kept around me, and influenced others; so after three months of this, I wrote to a mutual friend to learn if he were dead or living. The answer was that he had been dead over three months. If any Materialist anywhere here in the United States will giv me a full and complete mode of operation of nature that will explain the two facts of my experience herein related—that is, with my child and this friend—independent of the law of spirit control, and do it as comprehensivly as Darwin exposes by fact and method of nature the theory of evolution, I will giv them a good gold deposit. There must be no assertions of hallucination or misrepresented statements, but just as exact expositions as human power can make from the facts stated and by the exact methods of nature as now known by scientific revealments. We make spiritism a science. We will giv the supporting evidence of positions, and leave the result to a critical jury. We will answer any questions on the two experiences, so an expositor may be fully able to know our position in all its bearings. I will giv a good working deposit, easy to mine, desirably located, assay values from thirty or forty dollars per ton, on sampled ore—ore not workable by amalgamation to obtain good results; working process soon to be if not already being tested, by practical method now used as best process in Colorado; no yearly expenses on the deposit. Furthermore, if four, six, ten or more persons of reliability will arrange with Mr. Mansfield, Charles Watkins, or any other reliable slate writing mediums for a series of testings of their genuinness against Truesdell's frauds—that is, phenomenon independent of human origin as trick or legerdemain—I will giv to the cause of investigation, just such another mineral claim. I will giv it as marketable property to help maintain a science school in these departments. Others, putting to it some amount of means, can put it on the market or arrange to work it; the proceeds to be appropriated for this purpose. One thousand tons of ore is in sight. All natural agencies obtain to make these desirable properties. They are but a part of some large interests that much time and money hav been spent on, with the expectation in the not far distant future of working them.

Professor Tyndall and Herbert Spencer say they hav never investigated. Without investigation their assertions are worthless to a Positivist or a scientist or investigator. Professors Hare, Crookes, and Zoellner, equally as famous as Tyndall, if not more so, hav investigated. They say the facts are true. Elmina, now, it's easy to cut and slash a dead dog; not so easy to assert and investigate facts. Liberals and Spiritualists spend too much time kicking a dead God. If we push the new in its glory against the old, it will fly as a puff-ball before us. You are in a new place, wait a little before you sit down with Truesdell. Kindly yours, HANNAH T. STEARNS.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 to pay for your paper up to April 1st, next year, when I will renew for 1885. The paper suits me exaetly, and is just the kind of literature I relish. Allow me to congratulate you not only on the courage and radicalism made manifest, but also on the dignified and convincing way in which your arguments in support thereof are clothed. Oh, that your publications may be read in every household of the land! Then the day of jubilee would surely hav come. CHAS. J. SUNDELL.

ITHACA, N. Y., Oct. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $2 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I wish to say here that I am a truth seeker, and that I hav made many sacrifices the past forty years to learn what is truth in its application to myself as an individual. Consideration and self-examination are the first steps toward knowledge. Knowledge is progressiv, but all else in its compact essence and form is stationary and eternal. Thus knowledge, through the experience of personal phenomena, forty years ago, by a psychological transfiguration, has given me to understand that man, male and female, is the mental and intellectual embodiment of universal nature. That is to say, the faculty of all there is to be known is in him, and nowhere else.

There is no God that man has not made. What is God? If he or she is personal, he or she cannot be self-existent, as if a mental being, man has created him from his wonderful brain. Man has no capacity, being, or power outside of himself. The concentration of man's faculties upon an object, thing, or form may be called a god. I am bold to say my god is woman. I know of no object so central as woman. Others may hav other objects of worship, but she is my enthusiasm and worshipful. She morally is the mother of every living principle, as she is also the mother of all animal life. She has the beauty and the charms that no other creature possesses, and what would become of us all without the kisses and undying love of mother? A wife, if possible, is still nearer to man than a mother, because she is expected to be one with him in every phase of interest. She is in his counsel and confidence, and there are no secrets between them. The twain hav become in all respects as one flesh, nourishing and cherishing each the other. These twain are the embodiment, morally and physically, of all there is of nature in their comprehensiveness. They together possess mentally all the architectural genius and mechanical arts, and faculty to create all the gods, ghosts, spirits, angels, devils, subtle beasts, or beguiling serpents that possibly can exist in this mundane sphere of existence. Spiritualists hav not the faculty to go outside of nature, which is within the circumference of humanity. Spiritualists in the case of unbalanced organs may, through the sense of taste, create a beguiling serpent of selfish desire to perpetuate life after physical death, and to unlawfully and mysteriously change its condition and dwell altogether in a mental state of existence. This is an impossible condition of the fundamental principle of nature, and a fancy of the lower organs represented by the sense of taste, and the beguiling, creeping things of lower animal life. It is impossible that there should exist mental organism independent of animal organism, when animal life is the only sustenance possible to mental life. Consistency is a jewel. Friend Chainey has like lightning suddenly fallen from heaven (truth). He, like a female aspirant, by subtle knowledge has gone outside of human capacity, and formed a fanciful new heaven, without a foundation; in fact, trusting his inflated balloon in the chilling upper atmosphere. All his enjoyment, like orthodoxy, is dependent on anticipation, built on a bubble of air.

ZENAS KENT.

CONCORDIA, KAS., Nov. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: When reading comments in opposition to so-called spirit communion, I hav often wondered whether it were possible that I might be so cranky or light in the upper story as to be unable to appreciate them. Let it be understood that I am not one of those who lightly accept apparent proofs as realities; twenty-five years' earnest investigation of spirit phenomena, varied with the richest experience, failed to convince me. A few years, however, of home experience has, I think, nearly satisfied me. I know that THE TRUTH SEEKER is not published for the purpose of enlightening any one single individual, but I beg that some scholarly mind will take pains to enlighten me in a kind and courteous manner on what I wish to know. First, then, what I do not want to know: I do not want to know how fraud can be practiced; I do not want to know how truth can be simulated. All this we all know, but please assume the following generalities to be truths, and then giv some presumable explanation of them:

Husband and wife sit by a small wooden table from forty to sixty minutes once a week for two years. Something calling itself a control comes to that table, manifests its special individuality through certain complex combinations of letters. It lays plans for future developments; givs information unknown to them, some of which can be investigated and is found correct. It brings word as to health of friends and relativs always true. In the neighborhood, grant there liv another couple having the same control. They send word back and forth, and it is correctly reported. This and a thousand-fold more is the writer's experience.

One item more. Grant that one of these, say the husband, writes the name of a deceased person and hands it to the wife; that she soon describes the person whose name is written, not knowing who it is or what is written, giving character and full description—often even reminding him, who writes, of points forgotten.

Now, Mr. Editor, if some one will throw some general light upon this kind of truths, he will be looked upon as a benefactor among thousands who actually know these truths to exist. If he does not choose to accept them as truths, please treat them as such and giv probable explanation.

Kindly, B. R. ANDERSON.

PROHIBITION.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to reply to Mr. Walker, of a late issue of your paper, wherein he states that Longley & Co. are the only consistent prohibitionists in the land, because they wish for no liberty to do wrong, and that prohibition is contrary and inconsistent with liberty.

I do not think the present party of prohibition stands upon the best platform conceivable, yet that can be made to suit the majority who wish for the essentials. I wish to state that the essentials of prohibition are consistent with the widest liberty of mind or action, together with the greatest humanitarian principles. The essential feature of prohibition is to wipe out an illegitimate business, to blot from our government a complicity in crime, and to free our people from King Alcohol's powers.

Suppose I charge any business like the making of shoes, clothing, and food with being a crime or injuring people, would not these makers protect their business from scandal by proving immediately their good work, their important and necessary part of society? But suppose I arraign the liquor traffic as injuring people, will they attempt to prove their good intentions, their desire to form a useful and needed part of society?

The prohibition of the manufacture of intoxicating drinks and the sale of the same is the essential feature of prohibition. All will admit that society should educate from vice, and protect from crime. Every one will admit that injuring one's self is a vice, and that injuring another is, or should be, a crime. A crime is a legal wrong to another, but all wrongs may not now be recognized in the laws, while all will admit that every wrong done to another should be called a crime, and prohibited as wrong.

Upon these admissions I claim that the liquor traffic is, or should be, a crime, for it is a constant source of injury to man. All will admit that drinking is a vice. Then, I say, it is clearly the duty of society to educate against it. It is consistent with the widest conception of liberty that every person has the right to make for his own use whatever he desires, even if it injures him, but he has no right to make and sell an injury to another. That is the crime in the traffic of alcoholic drinks, that one person has the right to prepare a drink which is injurious to the health and condition of mind of the drinker, besides indirectly doing an untold sight of damage.

Does drinking alcohol injure a person? If it does, has any one the right as a question of pure justice to make and sell to another an injurious article? If not, why is not the prohibition of the liquor traffic right, to be be upheld by every lover of justice, every enemy of crime, and every humanitarian?

Yours for the right, FRANK MARTIN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"Little Folk."

Little hands clapping with gladness and glee,
Little hearts thoughtless and careless and free,
Little eyes beaming with joy and delight,
Little ones—all of them—merry and bright.

Bright little faces, and bright little eyes,
Fond little hearts that hav naught to disguise;
Dear little children so innocent and true,
Would that we all in this world were like you;

Like you in freedom from sorrow and sin,
Like you in freedom from all cares within,
Like you in innocence, happiness, truth—
Better for all if we were, in good sooth.

Enjoy while you may, then, the joys of the earth,
For the sorrows will soon, too soon hav their birth;
Be happy and merry, and laugh while you may,
And enjoy, while you can, young life's holiday.

Edward J. White.

A Sylvan Holocaust.

Oh, soft dews weep for a parting soul!
Oh, sweet bells ring a mournful toll!
While the pheasant drums a sounding roll.

Laughter and shouts from the dusky wood,
Where a giant oak through the ages stood—
A beacon now in the solitude.

Around the bole a funeral pyre
The mossy branches heaping higher,
And dirges wail through the leafy lyre.

Each startled flower like a spirit grieves,
And Chinese prayers are the burning leaves,
While a murd'rous shroud the red flame weaves.

Inlaid with smoke is the starry floor,
And captors jeer at the monarch's roar,
Nor dream of the danger brooding o'er.

Where the bees hang out, and the work is done;
The milk-pans turned to the morrow's sun,
Ring warning chimes from every one.

And Lotta, a child of tender years,
Reads in the clouds her dawning fears,
And her blue eyes hold a mist of tears.

"I'll go myself to the pasture lot,
For the twilight air blows fierce and hot
From the old tree worn with age and rot."

'Mid a thoughtless group so young and fair,
Silent and swift as an angel there,
With a saint-like face and shining hair.

"Oh, leave the tree where the boughs are red
My heart is faint with a nameless dread,
'Tis time for songs and the trundle-bed."

Her gentle voice, so low and sweet,
Has power to move the lagging feet,
And they seek the dewy lane's retreat.

But turning 'round ere they reach the bars,
When a crash goes up that rends the stars,
And sparks put out the fiery Mars.

And the mighty oak is lying low,
As a famous king from a falchion's blow,
Where the children late had played below.

Awakening heart of motherhood,
Sweet guardian of the helpless brood,
Revealed the dawn of angelhood.

One Pumpkin Pie.

A THANKSGIVING STORY.

"There! Everything is all ready for the morrow, and there'll only be the vegetables to pare and cranberries to stew," said Mrs. Morgan as she shut the pantry door to keep the cat out.

The next day was Thanksgiving, and the children were all coming home. There was but one grandchild, little Mollie Morgan, and, of course, she was the idol of them all.

Mrs. Morgan had got the turkeys all dressed, stuffed, and ready for the oven, and there was a nice array of pies—mince, apple, pumpkin, and custard. But when she closed the door so carefully to keep the cat out, she did not dream that she had shut the cat in. Becky, that was the cat's name, was a good rat-catcher, but she was a born thief. She was sleek and well-fed, yet for all that she liked to now and then, as opportunity offered, take that which she well knew was not intended for her. On this occasion she had slyly entered the pantry behind Mrs. Morgan, and secreted herself behind the sugar tub, and just as soon as the door closed and she heard the retreating footsteps of her mistress she began a tour of investigation.

"My goodness!" thought Becky; "they're to hav a tremendous dinner to-morrow. What fat turkeys! I wonder how they taste raw!" and she began to nibble the breast of one.

"Quite good, but rather saltish, I think. I guess I'll try the drumstick," and she tore off a piece of the leg. "But I don't think I like turkey as well as a good tautog, or a nice, fresh mackerel, after all," and thus apparently cogitating, Becky walked around the lower shelf until she came to the pies.

"That's mince," thought she, smelling of one, "and t'other's apple; I know by the nutmeg; and oh! my sakes alive, if here isn't just what I like best of all—a great round platter pie, all of pumpkin! How good it looks! I must taste it! They'll scold, I know, but I vow I cannot resist the temptation;" and without more ado, Becky sat down and commenced on the pie.

"The best pie Mrs. Morgan ever made, I do believe," thought the cat. "Lots of eggs in it, too. My mistress doesn't put crackers in her pies to save eggs—not she! Um! um! um! how good!" and Becky ate and ate till she had made a deep valley in the platter pie. "I wouldn't wonder if I get a licking for this," thought Becky, "but the recollection of this lick will more than balance it, I guess."

Then she took a bit of cheese, and stood up on her hind legs to see what was on the other shelves.

"I'll take a sup of milk, I guess," purred Becky. "O my! they havn't skimmed it. Here's cream—real cream! I'll hav some cream, if I hav to die for it," and lap, lap, lap went Becky's tongue, until the door opened, and there stood Mrs. Morgan in ghastly astonishment, and white with rage.

Becky jumped, and so did Mrs. Morgan, for with one glance she took in the whole extent of the mischief. Slap, slap, descended Mrs. Morgan's hand on Becky's back, but she quickly darted out and ran swiftly into the back room, where she concealed herself behind a barrel of apples.

"It's too bad, too bad!" ejaculated Mrs. Morgan; "that nice pie all gouged out like that! Hard as I worked—it's too much to bear! Robert is so fond of my pumpkin pies! Mary is a good cook, but she cannot begin to make such pies as I do, so Robert says. But how can my boy eat such a pie as that? I can't put it on the table, that's one thing; and there's no time to make another. O dear, I say! It's too bad to throw it away; some of it is good, but I could never stomach to eat after a cat. Maybe the Sullivan children will eat it. They will not mind the cat's mouth, and it's a pity to throw it away."

So Oliver, the chore boy, was called and instructed to carry the mangled pie to Meadow Lane, and leave it at the Sullivan shanty, where there were a baker's dozen of hungry children, who would not be at all squeamish in regard to eating after the cat, especially when it was such a large platter pie as that. It was after nine o'clock when Oliver started for Meadow Lane, and he had not reached the lane by two streets when he was accosted by a lad somewhat larger than himself, and older.

"Hello, sonny, what hav you there?"

"A pie," was Oliver's reply.

"Well, I'll take it—I'm hungry," and the lad snatched the pie from Oliver's trembling hands.

"Let me hav the pie—it's going to a poor family," and Oliver tried to take the pie back.

"No, no, sonny, they're not poorer than I, nor more hungry."

"Where's your home?"

"The Lord only knows, and I guess he doesn't care very much, seeing as I hav to look out for myself," and so saying, the boy walked off with the pie, leaving Oliver staring after him and whimpering.

John Walker was not a very good boy. He had a bad habit of lying, and stealing, too. Now, he was just out of the reform school, where he had been sentenced for three years. He could not remember the time when he had a father or mother. Perhaps if he had had good parents he would hav been different. I think he would, but his uncle had brought him up, and he was an unscrupulous man, and having children of his own, had not done by Johnny Walker as he would hav liked for one to do by his children. Johnny once had a job of sweeping out a gentleman's office, and he used to take things from the office and sell them to get money, and at last he was discharged, and his uncle had him sent to the reform school. When he came out the uncle refused to hav anything to do with him, and this course did not tend to make Johnny a better boy, you may be sure.

Well, he ate the pie, all of it, for he was very hungry, and threw the platter over the stone wall. Just as he turned out of E—— street, looking up to the tall houses on an aristocratic avenue, he saw a too bright light dancing upon the rear windows of one of the houses almost opposit. Watching it a moment he became convinced there was a fire within, under full headway, too. He instantly gave the alarm, and ran with all speed down to the house.

The engins were soon on the spot, and playing upon the fire.

There was nobody in the house, they said, the family being out. But suddenly a woman came rushing breathlessly along the street, and screaming, "The child! the child! there's a child there!"

The crowd surrounding the burning building was panic-stricken, for when the room was designated where the child was, they felt that it must be burnt to a crisp, or, if not burnt, suffocated by the smoke that was now issuing from the windows.

The father and mother had gone to a party that night, leaving their only child, a beautiful girl of three years, in charge of her nurse. The other servants were out, and, after the little girl was sound asleep, the nurse thought she would run around the corner to see a friend a few moments, and be back again long before the parents returned from the party. She had neglected to turn down the gas as she went out, and one window being let down from the top, the wind blew the light, fleecy curtain until it touched the gas jet near it, and the flame leaped upon it. Quickly the fire spread, and still the baby girl slept on. Round and round the room the red flames leaped, and when the nurse came with her story, all thought the baby had surely perished. The father and mother arrived upon the scene just as John Walker said, "Let me go and find the baby!"

Blinded by smoke, up he went to the second story window to the nursery, were the flames were first seen. Through smoke and fire he went, gasping, groping with hands outstretched to find the baby. He reached the crib—the child was not there. Feeling along the floor, with beating heart and trembling fingers, he touched something just under the little crib. It was the baby in her night-dress, but whether alive or dead he could not tell. He clasped the little form close to him with one arm, and groped his way through smoke and fire to the window. As he appeared with the child, a great shout went up from the multitude below. As the brave lad decended the ladder and laid the child in its mother's arms, he fell fainting at her side. His hands and face were burnt badly, but the little girl was unharmed. She had rolled from her crib, and lay when found face downward upon the carpet, and thus her life was saved.

The next morning when Johnny Walker came to his senses, he found himself in a nice, clean bed, and kind, benevolent faces bending over him. Recalling the events of the night before, and looking at his bandaged hands, he thought he must be in some sort of a hospital.

But he wasn't. He was in the Morgan mansion, and surrounded by all the family. It was Robert Morgan's only child, little Mollie, that he had rescued. She sat on the bed beside him, quite unharmed by the fire, with the exception of some little burns on her feet, but she had been almost suffocated by the smoke.

Robert Morgan said to the lad, "You seem familiar to me, somehow. I cannot get it out of my mind that I hav somewhere seen you before."

"You hav, Mr. Morgan, I am Johnny Walker, who used to sweep your office, and—and—"

"Never mind, my boy, that to which you would refer is all in the past. The future is before us, and is but just begun. You hav made for me, and for us all, the grandest thanksgiving that could possibly be," and tears of joy dropped on the face of little Mollie, as she was pressed to her father's bosom.

"Papa, am I your little smoked herring now?" They all laughed at Mollie's speech, while her mamma shuddered visibly as she thought how near her darling had been to the chill and darkness of death, and leaning over, she kissed the brow of the rescuer of her child.

Grandma Morgan commenced to tell the story of the pumpkin pie, and just then Oliver came in with a message. Johnny Walker recognized him, and when grandma told about the big highwayman who knocked Oliver down and made off with the pie, he laughed, and said, "I hope you will forgiv me—I am the highwayman, if you please!"

"You poor child—you shall never want for pie again as long as I liv," and grandma smoothed the hair that had been almost singed from his head at the fire.

It was a real thanksgiving at the Morgan mansion, and Grandpa Morgan called Becky, the cat, in, and holding Mollie on his knee, she stroked and petted the soft, handsome fur of the animal, who stretched herself and purred loudly.

"What do you suppose she thinks?" inquired Grandpa of Mollie.

"I dess she thinks she's glad she eated Gamma's puntin pie," said Mollie.

Becky winked slowly, as much as to say, "Right you are, Miss Mollie. If it hadn't been for the pie, Johnny Walker might not hav been at the fire, and you might not hav been here at this present time, you know."

Johnny Walker was the hero of the day, and when he recovered, Mr. Morgan took him into his law offices and into his home, and with plenty to eat, and comfortable surroundings, he forgot his old tricks and became an excellent boy. One of these days he will be a lawyer, and, perhaps, occupy very responsible positions, but I venture to say he will never forget the platter pumpkin pie, and the results following it.

Dear Miss Wixon: We hav been constant readers of The Truth Seeker for eight or nine years, and it is our Encyclopedia as far as religion is needed, but as much as it has been to us, heretofore, it seems more perfect now since the children can come to their cosy Corner and be entertained in so charming a style. I myself read the Children Corner with almost as much enthusiasm as our little boy does who never misses one of its beautiful stories.

Inclosed you will find two small poetical contributions, which I hope may prove worthy a place in the Corner. The one entitled "Whither," was written on the occasion of my children going from home to attend school, and the "Sylvan Holocaust" is a true story of what was almost a fearful accident that came into my mother's childhood. Her mother being dead, and children both older and younger than herself, the care of the little ones fell upon her. They had been burning the old tree for several evenings, but that night she said she felt impelled by some vague, undefined fear to go and bring them home at once, and had only moved a few rods away when it fell.

Accept my best wishes for the Corner, and believe me yours sincerely, Mary B. Finch.

Poetry.

A Realistic Dream.

In my sleep I had climbed to a mountainous hight,
Where the steep wall of heaven bloomed over with flowers—
An offending brown wall, in a dim, murky light,
Whose somber hue came from our churches and towers.
But the finger of Fate and of Science was there,
And plucked the dark stones in a ruinous way,
Until those that were left had fashioned a stair,
And flowers reached down that are blooming to-day.
While Hades through centuries crimsoned the leaves,
And blood from the wars of religions may be.
Humanity touched all the trembling sheaves,
And the petals grew white as the foam of the sea.

Grand heroes hav opened that orthodox fence,
That was tarnished long ages with shadow and smoke,
And embraced the whole universe, deeper and dense
Than the world could believe while it carried a yoke.
No more shall the blooms of that stairway be red,
And never again shall its fabled gate be,
Nor stone be replaced, nor spirit be sad,
For the blossoms transformed are as foam of the sea.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

William Denton.

"Slain by the one he worshiped?" nay, not so,
But wooed by her he loved to needed rest,
Laid tired head upon her faithful breast,
Murmuring in dreams of home: "I go, I go."

Nature herself, whose love in ceaseless flow
His whole life's noble work was set to prove—
Hoping to show, discord and strife above,
Her great heart's brooding care with tenderness aglow.

Kind mother, thus, to snatch your child from fever-tearing hands of pain.
Thy dreamless peace let fall on him who was thus "lonely lain."
What stately pillar can we raise in that far, barren wild
To prove his constancy to you, your faithful loving child?
What more than this: Who die for truth, die but to liv again.

—Mattie Krekel.

A Missionary Spoiled.

Robert Keyworth was a poor orphan boy, who was raised by hand, so to speak, by the family of the Rev. Mr. Thomas, a reliable Methodist clergyman, who resides in the suburbs of Austin. Robert was naturraly a good boy. He was of a loving, gentle disposition, and owing to his surroundings, he grew up to be a most exemplary youth. He became converted at an early age, and expressed a frenzy to study for the ministry. In order to qualify himself for his high and lofty calling he studied day and night until he became so thin and pale that he was obliged to giv up his studies in order to regain his former appetite. The medical gentleman who was called in insisted that a change of air was indispensable, and urged that young Keyworth be sent out on the frontier, where an activ life among the cowboys would soon restore him to his original strength. Robert refused to listen to this advice at first. He said such a life might divert his mind from his sacred calling, and while he was getting his body in good trim, he might lose his immortal soul. Parson Thomas had no such fears. On the contrary, he was of the opinion that the unostentatious piety of Robert could not fail to create a profound impression on the wild nomads of the prairies. In the hands of Providence, Robert might become the humble instrument by which many brands on the frontier might be snatched from the burning. Robert no longer objected. On the contrary, he was anxious to begin his missionary labors at once. Mounted on a gentle old mare, armed with an umbrella, and his saddle-bags filled with church literature, he bid a tearful farewell to his kind benefactor, who made him a present of his blessing, and journeyed toward the setting sun.

Robert's letters to Parson Thomas were not very numerous, nor were they of as spiritual a nature as might hav been expected. Robert had regained his health, for he referred to running horse races and other modes of regaining his strength.

One morning, about a year after Robert left for the frontier, an unmistakable cowboy, wearing a large Mexican hat and spurs, rang the bell at the modest suburban residence of Parson Thomas. On being admitted he introduced himself as Bill Kelly. He was the friend and chum of Robert, who had directed him to call on his former benefactor

"I am truly glad to hear from my young friend. I suppose Robert has entirely regained his health."

"Robert is all hunkey, but he had a mighty close call week before last."

"You don't tell me that Robert has already had a call! How much salary was he offered by the congregation?"

"I don't mean that kind of a call. We was chased by the Injnns while we was out hunting stock, and if it hadn't been for a motte of timber they would hav got our scalps, sure. It was a mighty close call."

"Oh, you were in peril from Indians. Tell me, when you first saw the Indians, did not Robert tell you that you should rely on divine providence—that the very hairs of your head are all numbered?"

"No, he didn't say that, Robert didn't. He said our days were numbered if we didn't get to that motte of timber quicker than hell a' beatin' tanbark."

"I regret to hear that Robert has learned to swear, but I suppose it was due to the excitement of the moment. However, when you got to the motte of timber, and were safe from Indians, did not Robert throw himself on his knees?"

"He did that very thing, Parson. He just flung himself on his knees, and raised up——"

"His hands in prayer to offer up thanksgiving for his escape. I knew that the religious principles I had instilled into that boy would bring forth good fruit. He raised up——"

"Yes, he flung himself on his knees, and he raised up his Winchester and offered up the nearest Injun. Shot him right out of the saddle, and, Parson, right here is his scalp," and Kelly threw down on the table a fresh Indian scalp.

Parson Thomas recoiled in horror. "Robert told me to tell you it was the spile of his spear and bow, and that, like David, he thanked God who had taught his fingers to fight and his hands to war," said Kelly.

Parson Thomas was inexpressibly shocked that the teachings should hav borne such fruits.

"It pains me very much to hear that Robert has become so neglectful of his Christian duties. So you escaped without loss."

"No, indeed we didn't. One of the Indian bullets hit a bottle of cocktail in Robert's saddle bag, and ruined our only deck of poker cards. There was not another bottle of cocktail or a deck of poker cards within forty miles. That hurt Robert. He said if it had not been for the consolation of religion which you had instilled into him, that he didn't know what he would hav done."

"My young friend," said Parson Thomas sadly; "you cannot imagin how badly I feel over your account of Robert's recklessness. From what you say I cannot but believe that he has become profane, that he indulges in strong drink, and in card playing. He may yet repent of his sins, and become a worthy Christian."

"I've not told you the worst about Robert," said Kelly hesitatingly. "He has—"

"Committed murder?"

"Worse than that."

"Impossible!"

"He ran for the legislature."

"He is lost beyond redemption."

"And he was elected, too."

"Worse and worse."

"And he says when he comes to Austin he is going to hav you elected chaplain of the House."

"Hey?"

"And you will get five dollars a day for a five minutes' prayer."

"God bless the noble boy," and when Kelly left, Parson Thomas had tears in his eyes, and was fondling the Indian's scalp.

ANOTHER NEW BOOK!

New! Eloquent! Elegant! Splendid!

JUST PUBLISHED.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

1857. } SECOND GRAND ANNUAL } 1885.

New Years Gift Presentation,

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE 28TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE

ROCHELLE JEWELRY STORE.

January 1, 1885,

At 2 P. M., ROCHELLE, ILL.

Last year on New Year's day Wettstein presented to his patrons assembled in Armory Hall, a valuable collection of beautiful presents, comprising 10 Gold Watches and Gold Chains; half a dozen genuin Diamond Pins, Rings, and Eardrops; over a dozen fine Silver Watches, solid Gold Jewelry, elegant Silverware, Faucy Goods, etc., ranging in price from $1.00 to $100.00.

This I propose to do this year and to giv my Liberal friends abroad an opportunity to receive a nice present.

The aggregate of goods presented will not be less than $1,500, and probably $2,000, according to amount of goods sold.

To all my customers sending $1.00 or more for goods or work, I shall present, for each and every dollar, a certificate entitling the owner to one or more shares in these gifts.

This is the fairest and most liberal offer ever made by any merchant in America My stock is complete in everything pertaining to a first-class jewelry store; prices now averaging 25 per cent below those of largest cities; goods sent by mail or express to all parts of the world accompanied by one certificate for every dollar remitted, and cash refunded if not satisfactory, and returned same day received.

Prices on watches again reduced since last price list in this paper. The presents will be presented in a public hall of Rochelle, directly to my customers, or to a committee selected by them at that time, in one entire lot, and the mode of distribution will be optional with them.

Everybody pleased last year, and all must be pleased this year.

Circulars giving all particulars and describing style and value of each gift, mailed free on application. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but now is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

BRETHREN, my heart's desire and prayer are for the progress and happiness of the human race, that they may all so far as possible come to a knowledge of the truth, for the truth freeth from bondage and superstition and maketh its possessor free indeed. For I bear record before you and all men that I feel a love for the truth and I rejoice in my heart greatly when any man or woman doth find it. I feel a zeal for the truth which gives me peace and I find a joy in its service that the advocates of error cannot deprive me of.—D. M. Bennett.

NOT religion, which is really nothing else than the ethical sentiment of loyalty; and not self-interest, whose satisfactions require associativ harmony, but the dictionary. or the perfidy of language, whose Babel curse continues, in each national idiom, still to compromise thought—the dictionary is the miscreativ genius of human antagonisms. Now I hav not the pretension of the great "pantarch," to alwatize the human race, but I hav that of moralizing our dictionary a deux, or for a limited circle of sympathetic minds.—Lazarus ("Edgeworth") in Liberty.

THE morality in Christianity has never opposed the freedom of thought. It has never put, nor tended to put, a chain on a human mind, nor a manacle on a human limb; but the doctrins distinctivly Christian—the necessity of believing a certain thing; the idea that eternal punishment awaited him who failed to believe; the idea that the innocent can suffer for the guilty—these things hav opposed, and for a thousand years substantially destroyed, the freedom of the human mind. All religions hav, with ceremony, magic, and mystery, deformed, darkened, and corrupted the soul. Around the sturdy oaks of morality hav grown and clung the parasitic, poisonous vines of the miraculous and monstrous.—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

WE are not much in the habit of idolizing either the living or the dead. And we think that there is no more certain indication of a weak and ill-regulated intellect than that propensity which, for want of a better name, we will venture to christen Boswellism. But there are a few characters which hav stood the closest scrutiny and the severest tests, which hav been tried in the furnace and hav proved pure, which hav been weighed in the balance and hav not been found wanting, which hav been declared sterling by the general consent of mankind, and which are visibly stamped with the image and superscription of the most high. These great men we trust that we know how to prize; and of these was Milton. The sight of his books, the sound of his name, are pleasant to us. . . . Nor do we envy the man who can study either the life or the writings of the great poet and patriot, without aspiring to emulate, not, indeed, the sublime works with which his genius has enriched our literature, but the zeal with which he labored for the public good, the fortitude with which he endured every private calamity, the lofty disdain with which he looked down on temptations and dangers, the deadly hatred which he bore to bigots and tyrants, and the faith which he steadily kept with his country and with his fame.—Macaulay's Milton.

IS there anything that we hav heard oftener repeated, or with greater emphasis, for some years past, than this, that nowadays the point is not what a man believes, but how he behaves; as regards the writer, not what he teaches men to believe, but how he instructs them to act? Very well; now comes one who takes all this in earnest and who sincerely believes that a man's creed is no longer taken into account. He removes certain pillars of the faith, which he has found to be in a state of decay, without, however, offering to mankind anything new with regard to moral conduct; simply exhorting them to the practice of much the same virtues as they regarded as sacred before, though from somewhat less selfish motivs. Surely the man will not be molested on account of what he has said, but will be treated with as much respect as ever before. Undoubtedly he would, if our boasted liberality were anything more than a mere phrase.—Strauss.

THAT implicit credulity is a mark of a feeble mind, will not be disputed; but it may not, perhaps, be so generally acknowledged that the case is the same with unlimited skepticism; on the contrary, we are sometimes apt to ascribe this disposition to a more than ordinary vigor of intellect. Such a prejudice was by no means unnatural at that period in the history of modern Europe, when reason first began to throw off the yoke of authority; and when it unquestionably required a superiority of understanding, as well as of intrepidity, for an individual to resist the contagion of prevailing superstition. But in the present age, in which the tendency of fashionable opinions is directly opposit to those of the vulgar; the philosophical creed, or the philosophical skepticism of by far the greater number of those who value themselvs on an emancipation from popular errors, arises from the very same weakness with the credulity of the multitude; nor is it going too far to say, with Rousseau, that "he who, in the end of the eighteenth century, has brought himself to abandon all his early principles without discrimination would probably hav been a bigot in the days of the League."—Dugald Stewart's Philosophy of the Human Mind. The League, here referred to by Rousseau, has a peculiar importance in the history of France, as applied to the opposition organized by the Duke of Guise to the granting of the free exercise of their religion and political rights to the Huguenots. This League was formed in 1576 for the maintenance and defense of the Roman Catholic religion.—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

THOUSANDS of human generations, all as noisy as our own, hav been swallowed up of time and there remains no wreck of them any more; and Arcturus and Orion and Sirius and the Pleiades are still shining in their courses, clear and young, as when the shepherd first noted them in the plain of Shinar. Pshaw! what is this paltry little dog-cage of an earth; what art thou that sittest whining there? Thou art still nothing, nobody; true, but who then is something, somebody?—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

"I'll giv no encouragement, sirrah," said she,
To such a knee-farious scheme."

WE love poetry, especially when it conveys to us such a startling truth as was recently given to the world in a poem beginning, "Darkness creeps o'er us as night comes on." A truth like that, even though crushed to earth, would bob up serenely every now and then.

THOUGHTS IN CHURCH.

HE.

"She kneels beside the altar, now,
An earthly angel, pure and fair.
Would I my troubled head could bow
And join her in that silent prayer.
Lights falling through the stainless glass
Are changed to rainbows as they pass,
And, charmed, about my loved one lie.
Sweet saint, what is thy whispered thought?
For thou art praying now, while I—
Unworthy of thee, I am not."

SHE.

"Good gracious! there is Sam, I vow!
I wonder if he sees me.
Yes, he is watching me. Oh, how
That fellow tries to please me!
I hope he likes my hat and dress;
But then he thinks me perfect. Yes,
I like him, but he's poor, and so
I fear I must refuse him.
He's awfully nice to flirt with, though,
I really hate to lose him."

SPEAKING of the late exciting election and the large bets that were made, Robert Burdette recently said to a reporter: "I did not bet any money on the recent election. It has been many years since I upheld my political principles by coining them for base drachmas. Years ago, when I was young and charming—rather a trifle more young than I was more charming—I bet a box of cigars with a political foe, but an esteemed personal friend, on the election of Mr. Hayes. To giv him a show for his white alley, I bet him a hat on the result in New York. The returns promptly decided that I lost the hat, and the United States Congress and the High Joint Arbitration Commission, after gravely considering the question for many weeks, finally informed me that I had won the box of cigars. I never dreamed that such a simple bet would throw the republic into such a painful state of suspense, excitement, and confusion. I said then that never again would I thoughtlessly tamper with the peace and happiness of my country, though all my political foes went bareheaded and I had to pick up stubs for my personal smoking all the days of our respectiv and respected lives. I paid my hat bet. I went to the hatter with my friend and had his head blocked for a special order. His blocked head fairly swam with joy when I told him I was going to hav a hat made specially for him. He said, 'Robert——' The sober, solemn truth is he said 'Bob,' but that doesn't look well in print, and I hate the name anyhow. 'Robert, if you win the cigars, which heaven forbid, I will go to Havana and make them myself.' I knew he would not, far better than he did. The hat was made under the personal supervision of the hatter, by and with the advice and consent of myself. It was a slick, shiny hat. It was about eighteen inches high, and as symmetrical as a stove-pipe. It was the same size all the way up. The brim was about an inch and a quarter wide, flat and straight as a silver dollar. It would hav been the pride of a St. Patrick's Day procession. It was the awfulest hat. Strong men shuddered when they saw it. I don't believe such a hat was ever made before, or behind. Well, I gathered about a score of our mutual friends. We got the band out, set the hat on top of a dry goods box in an open wagon and paraded down to my friend's store, and I presented the hat with an elaborate and ornate address. Men said it was the greatest effort of my life. I think it was. It not only fatigued me, but the people who heard it. When the court of arbitration at last decided the other bet, the band and the crowd came out again. and my foe presented me with a box of cigars. At the conclusion of the presentation speech he proposed that we smoke the weed of peace. I could not refuse. I faltered my thanks, lighted a cigar, and puffed twice or thrice. That was nearly eight years agone, and yet sometimes I am aroused from the profoundest slumber in the dead of night by the lingering farewell of that cigar. A policeman, who accidentally happened to be awake that afternoon, came along and arrested me on a charge of disorderly conduct, arson, and assault with intent to commit hydrophobia. The magistrate smelled my breath as I pleaded not guilty, and fined me $10. I went home, and a committee of my neighbors waited on me at long range, and gave me twenty-four hours to leave the state. I left the box of cigars on the office steps, and two tramps were found dead beside it next morning. The board of health filed information against me for conspiracy, seized the cigars and threw them into the Mississippi river. All the fish between Burlington and Keokuk died that week. I took down my shot-gun, breathed in it, pointed it at a dog, and he turned into a stone. I blew fiercely down the barrel of the gun, intending to hunt for my foe, and the gun burst on the spot. I—but why recount the harrowing experiences of that week of horror? I only mention these few leading facts, because truth has been sadly seldom during the recent campaign."

Notes and Clippings.

VICTOR HUGO says that Bartholdi's statue of Liberty will constitute a pledge of lasting peace between France and America.

"I BELIEVE the Lord can save reporters," said a New Haven hallelujah lassie recently. "I knew one who was converted. He left the business, and henceforth followed an honest life."

ONE-THIRD of the newspapers published in Italy bear the title of Gazette, the name having been handed down from 1570, when the first gossipy little sheet saw daylight at Venice, and was sold for a small coin, gazetta.

THE Christian scientists hold that mind has supreme power over matter; that the sick may become well if they only think so, and, indeed, are well if they believe and act as if they were. They hav a church in Boston, and a college where, for $300, one may be taught how to become a healer.

THOUSANDS of titles to written and unwritten plays and books hav been filed with the librarian of Congress, with a fee of a dollar in each instance, under the impression that some sort of protection is thus gained. The law requires a deposit of the entire work, without which there is no copyright.

PUBLIC telephone service has been established throughout Belgium, and for a franc a merchant in Brussels may converse five minutes with a friend or business correspondent in Antwerp of Liege. An extra ten cents entitles him to an aditional five minutes. It is thought this system will largely supersede the sending of written telegrams.

JOHN RUSKIN says that the missionary office of England in Africa and America has chiefly consisted in "stealing lands and exterminating their inhabitants;" that the introduction of Christianity into India has "only taught the nativs to wear Paisley shawls instead of cashmere," and that the "Christian aid" in Australia has been principally to "help pious farmers to convict labor."

SPEAKING of Thanksgiving, the Sun observes of the original keepers of the day that "they had got away from England, and had found what they sought in the wilderness; not, as the amiable Mrs. Hemans has written down for the many generations of schoolboys, 'freedom to worship God,' but the opportunity of making it warm for everybody, Quaker, Baptist, Catholic, or Anglican, who was not content with the rigid Puritan creed."

THERE is a big discount on ministers' boys. A clergyman's wife recently presented him with a son, and the happy father, as he went his parochical rounds, was congratulated by the members of his congregation. There was one old farmer, however, who received the tidings very coldly, but when he perceived the pastor's disappointment he good naturedly explained: "I aint got no spite; it's all accordin' to natur', I s'pose; but when I think of that boy of yourn I can't help reck'ning that in a few years there'll hav to be a new fence put 'round my watermelon patch."

THE inherent evils of Mormonism found a thrilling exemplification in the case of the pretty young English girl who was rescued from the unholy grip of the "Saints" on the Arizona, one day last week. Lured from her home by specious promises, she discovered before she reached this city that she was destined to a living death in the haunts of the polygamists, and chivalrous hearts and hands were reached out to protect her. Congress has for twenty years been hammering away at this "twin relic of barbarism" and has accomplished nothing, in spite of the pious protests it put forth for political effect. While it is not desirable, says the Mercury, that the government should interfere with the religious faith of any citizen, it would not be objectionable if emigrants destined for Utah were made acquainted on their arrival with the social and moral peculiarities of Mormondom, and questioned as to their desire to cast in their fortunes with polygamists,

THE Catholic mission at Hong Kong, China, has advices that the viceroy of Canton has closed all the chapels there, and has also razed the entire Catholic settlement. A missionary who has arrived at Canton from the interior says that the Christians in the western provinces are fugitivs in the wilds of Tonquin. The Chinese authorities in the northern provinces issued a decree for the expulsion of all missionaries. Upon an appeal to the higher authorities at Pekin, however, the decree was reversed, and the missionaries taken under the protection of the Chinese general government.

DE WITT TALMAGE says: "No man ever committed a forgery, ever absconded, or ever did a wrong in business, if he first consulted his wife." At first thought that seems pretty true; near enough to be accepted as a rule. But, somehow, the suspicion steals over one who attended Sunday-school before the war that there are instances on record in the Bible where men were induced to do wrong by their wives. Somebody has borrowed the Sun's Bible, and therefore this matter cannot be settled before going to press. Wasn't there a lady named Eva, or some such short name, who caused her husband, a good man, to go wrong? And there were others, too—Lots of them—we are sure. —Peck's Sun.

THE Times of India givs an account of a nativ cure of snake bite at Walkeshwur. A Hindoo woman having been bitten on the ankle, her husband applied a bandage above the wound, and sent for a famous Indian specialist in such matters. The man recommended the chicken cure. Twelve liva chickens were brought to the house, and applied to the wound one after the other. All of them died from the effects of the poison, and two more were sent for; these two lived, and the patient was declared cured. The matter having been reported to the police, the woman was removed to a hospital, but at the end of five hours the doctors found no signs of poisoning, and permitted her to walk home.

THE angel theory as to the genesis of mankind is becoming effete. It won't do. "Mamma," said four-years-old, as she stood on tiptoe by the bedside and peered at her new little brother, "where did that baby come from?" "The angels brought him, darling," said mamma. "Oh, I wish I hadn't gone out to play this morning. But how did the angels know you wanted him? Oh, I guess you must hav written them a letter, and the wind must hav taken it and blowed it right up to heaven, and then the angels got the letter. I wonder how they got in when they brought him. Did you open the window for them?" Enter eight-years-old boy: "Where'd that baby come from?" "The angels brought him," said mamma. "Oh, come off! What are you giving us?"

THE following conversation concerning the religious views and practices of Washington is reported in the Cleveland Leader: "Do you think he was a religious man?" "No," was the reply; "I do not. He was a church-member, you know, and a vestryman, but the vestry in those days was a semi-political and charitable board. I hav heard old citizens say that Washington would often leave the church before service was over. Communion, you know, is served at the last of the service. The fact that Washington slighted communion is evidence to my mind that he was not a Christian of the cast-iron kind. Another evidence is the fact that he had no preacher at his bedside during his last sickness. He was sick, you know, for several days, and there must hav been ample time to hav gotten a preacher if he desired it. He was thoroughly conscious until the last, and it is said that he timed his pulse as long as the breath was in his body. As it left him his hand dropped from his wrist and he sank back dead. During his last hours he gave the most minute directions as to business matters, directing his wife to go and get the two wills which he had made and burn the one which he wished annulled. He directed that his corpse be kept for three days, and Tobias Lear, his private secretary, says among his last words were those in regard to his burial. He died on Saturday night, and on the next Wednesday he was buried in a walnut coffin lined with lead. Many years after this his body was changed from this box to the marble tomb in which it now lies."

DR. JACOBI, who has made it a special study, concludes that, as a rule, a child should not be sent to school before it is eight years old. Not till this age is its brain substance sufficiently developed. An infant's brain is soft. It contains a large percentage of water. It is deficient in fat and phosphorus, on which, to a great extent, intellectual activity depends. The convolutions are fewer. The different parts of the brain do not grow in size and weight alike—the normal proportion of the front, back, and lateral portions not being reached before the age of ten. So, too, the normal proportion of the chest to the lower portions of the body is not attained until the eighth year, while that part of the back (the lumbar) on which the sitting posture mainly depends, is even then only moderately developed.

GEN. JOE JOHNSTON said to a newspaper man who asked him about the origin of the Confederate battle flag: "At the battle of Manassas—you Northerners call it Bull Run—the stars and bars proved a failure, because they were so much like the Union colors. Indeed, both armies mistook their enemies for friends, and vice versa. After the battle I had resolved to discard this flag, and called for each regiment to procure its state colors. This they were not able to do, and I asked the army for new designs. Among those presented one by Gen Beauregard was chosen, and I altered this only in making it square instead of oblong. This flag was afterward adopted by the Confederate armies. It was a Greek cross of blue on a red field, with white stars on the blue bars. This flag was designed by a Col. Walton, of Louisiana, and presented to Gen. Beauregard."

EVERETT FARNHAM died at Richfield, Summit county, Ohio, a few days ago, at the age of 84. He was deemed eccentric. He called his lands his domains. On his farm was a large tract of meadow land which he called "God's Heart," and of this he took especial care. He was a great admirer of England and British customs, and on a recent visit to London undertook to defend to the Britishers in the streets the advantages of republicanism, and was arrested and fined. In clearing land he would never burn his brush, but placed it in piles and allowed it to rot. He was an avowed Infidel, and had a large library of books treating on Infidelity. Four or five of his acres were inclosed as a park, in which he kept deer, elk, and buffalo. He said that at one time the emperor of Germany had sent an envoy to purchase his elk. Mr. Farnham was an honest, upright man, and was highly respected.

OFFICER WILSON, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, saw Florence Oliver and Thomas Hanscomb, children, who were inmates of the Rev. William H. Ramscar's "Home for Children and Seminary for Young Girls," at St. Nicholas avenue and 153d street, enter shops in Second avenue on July 8th, and beg for food. They took the food that was given them to the wagon of the Home, which was driven slowly down the avenue, stopping at the doors of the shops that they entered. At 4th street, Officer Wilson arrested the children for begging, and a police justice committed them to the care of Mr. Gerry's society. Mr. Ramscar was arrested upon the charge of sending the children out to beg. He was tried last week in the General Sessions. He was comfortably clad, and had the appearance of being well fed. He is elderly, bland, and portly. Proof that the children were sent out to beg by Mr. Ramscar was introduced by the prosecution. Mr. Ramscar's counsel offered no testimony for the defense, arguing that the begging that the children did was not mendicancy within the meaning of the statute. The law, he contended, applies to street beggers, but not to children who ask for charity for a benevolent institution The jury, after deliberating for two hours, convicted Mr. Ramscar, but recommended him to the mercy of the court. Recorder Smith sentenced him to thirty days' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of $100.

News of the Week.

AN increase of $750,000 in the national publict debt during the month of November is announced.

MUCH discontent prevails in Ireland, and it is reported that the secret societies are again very activ.

MICHAEL DE YOUNG, the editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, who was shot by young Spreckels, is recovering.

THE cost per year of running the postal department of this nation, according to the post-office report, is about $50,000,000.

IT is reported from Danville, Pa., that two laboring men, while digging for roots, unearthed an iron box containing $47,000, mostly in Mexican gold and silver coins.

SOMEBODY sent a Newfoundland pup to President-elect Cleveland. In declining the gift Gov. Cleveland hints that it will be useless for people to attempt to make him any presents, as he will not accept them.

PROFESSOR ADLER lectured last Sunday on the necssity of sanitary preparation to ward off the possible advent of cholera in New York next summer, and the Young Men's Hebrew Association met and organized a movement for the sanitary improvement of Hebrew tenement localities.

THERE were 32,067 deaths in this city in the eleven months ending Nov. 30th. The number of deaths for the corresponding period of last year was 31,378. The number of births reported in the eleven months was 27,537; last year it was 26,562 There hav been 10,865 marriages reported thus far this year, which is 345 more than for the same period last year.

A WOMAN who keeps a disreputable house in this city was in the courts last week charged with assaulting her colored servant with intent to kill. The woman was promptly bailed by an alderman. The judge complained that the chief obstacle to justice in this city was the aldermen, who were always ready to bail criminals. He expressed himself as unable to account for it. The fact is easily explained, however. The aldermen are mainly Catholic. So are the criminals.

LAST Sunday F. De Castro, of Newark, N. J., shot himself to death. He left a statement that he was going to a happier future world, where a kind and loving father ruled. Frank Saunders, of Brooklyn, fired a bullet into his brain and fell across the body of his sick wife. When discovered, both were dead. Frederick Sprahn, of Hoboken, took poison and died in a cave. John Francis, a hackman, of Mt. Vernon, hanged himself in a stable. Robert K. Stewart died in the New York Hospital from a self-inflicted wound. August Koss, of Paterson, N. J., shot himself thrice in the head and died upon the rear stoop of the house of a friend. Bertha Soyalowsky, a young Russian immigrant girl, jumped into the North river to drown herself. This all occurred on a Sabbath day.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK had Charles Conroy in the courts again last Saturday, charged with selling an unlawful photograph. It was a picture of an actress in stage costume. Comstock did not claim that the picture was an immoral one, but merely indecent. Col. Spencer, counsel for the defendant, poked fun at Comstock; Professor A. L. Rawson furnished the judge with a pamphlet issued by the National Defense Association containing some damaging facts about the "agent," and Conroy shook his fist in Comstock's face and called him a liar and a villain. Conroy is the one-armed man who some years ago gave Comstock the mark upon the cheek which won him the name of "Scarfaced Tony." For this reason Comstock has pursued the man ever since. The present arrest is a plain case of persecution. Conroy was once imprisoned by Comstock upon a charge which he (Conroy) protests was false, and which was unsupported except by Comstock's own testimony. As the "agent's" oath has since been adjudged unworthy of credence, there is no reason for believing tha Conroy was guilty.

Communications.

Antichrist.—Vol. II.—Peter and Paul.

There are thirteen extant apocryphal gospels, six relating to the Virgin Mary and the infant Jesus, and seven to the crucifixion and subsequent events. Some of these come down to us in different versions, and with many essential variations.

"The Protevangelion," purporting to be written by James of Jerusalem, describes Mary as miraculously conceived in the absence of her husband. Mary was brought up in the temple; at the age of twelve or fourteen she was intrusted to the care of Joseph, an old widower with several children. Joseph was not pleased, and went away to work at his trade. On his return, he was much agitated to find Mary enceinte. She protested her innocence, and upon a trial before the high priest she and Joseph were acquitted. Then came the journey to Jerusalem to be enrolled, but at Bethlehem they were compelled to stop, and the child was born in a cave.

"Pseudo-Matthew" varies the story and adds further details. He describes the flight into Egypt, the return to Galilee, and numerous miracles wrought by the boy Jesus, concluding with a family feast and a list of the relativs of Jesus, including three Aunt Marys, two Cousin Jameses, one Cousin John, and a fourth-cousin, John the Baptist.

"The Nativity of Mary" givs another brief, but varied, account of the two miraculous conceptions—i. e., of Mary and her mother Anna.

"The History of Joseph the Carpenter" givs most important particulars concerning Joseph. He was a bachelor until forty-eight, and a widower at eighty-nine, with four sons and two daughters. He was betrothed to Mary, to be married when she arrived at a suitable age. His third son, James, was tenderly attached to his prospectiv step-mother. The old gentleman went away to work at his trade. On his return he was sorely distressed at Mary's condition. But an angel appeared in a dream and explained to him the mystery of the immaculate conception. Jesus was born, and lived in sweet accord with his half-brothers. Mary never had another child. Joseph lived to the age of one hundred and eleven. Jesus, then nineteen years of age, attended his death-bed. Death and Gehenna, with mouths belching flames, appeared and frightened the dying man, but Jesus drove back the hideous host, and the soul of Joseph departed in peace. Such was the narrativ delivered by Jesus to his apostles.

"The Gospel of Thomas" describes the flight into Egypt and the return to Nazareth, repeating the miracles with variations and additions. Jesus was two years old when taken to Egypt, and remained there one year. The book ends with an account of the dispute of the doctors in the temple, agreeing substantially with Luke.

"The Gospel of the Infancy" begins much like the "Protevangelion." It fixes the birth of Jesus two or three years before Christ, and describes the flight into Egypt, with numerous additional miracles. The holy family remain in Egypt three years, until the death of Herod, 4 B.C. After relating the dispute with the doctors in the temple, the writer says that Jesus retired to Nazareth and studied the law until he completed his thirtieth year, when he was baptized in the Jordan.

"The Gospel of Nicodemus, or Acts of Pilate," Part I., records at great length the trial, crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension of Christ. The date is the 15th year of Tiberius (A.D. 29), the 19th year of Herod of Galilee (A.D. 15), and the 4th year of the 202d Olympiad (A.D. 32). The ascension is from a mountain in Galilee.

Part II. describes the descent of Christ into hell. Satan and Hades confer about the coming of the crucified Jesus. Lazarus having lately escaped out of the place, Hades is afraid Jesus will raise all the dead. So they prepare to resist his coming. But the King of Glory, strong and mighty, bursts the bars of iron and brass, binds Satan hand and foot, and delivers him over to the custody of Hades until the second appearing. The dark places are lighted up, and all the imprisoned saints are released and sent to Paradise, including the penitent thief.

"Pilate's Letter to Tiberius Cæsar" praises Jesus, and says that the sibyls warned the Jews not to crucify him. Pilate resisted the execution all he could, but was compelled to yield to their importunity.

"The Report of Pilate" is made to Augustus Cæsar. One of the versions has "Tiberius" in the title, but "Augustus" in the opening sentence. And a similar blunder appears in the Latin appendix to the "Gospel of Nicodemus; or, Acts of Pilate," which says that Pilate wrote a letter to Claudius Cæsar about the ministry and death of the son of God. In the "Report of Pilate," he says that Jesus was delivered up to him by Herod, Archelaus, Philip, Annas, Caiaphas, and others. (Archelaus was banished to Gaul A.D. 7 or 8, where he is supposed to hav died). Pilate describes the darkness at mid-day, the moon turning to blood and failing to shine, the sun shining from the third hour of the night (9 o'clock) until morning, and the swallowing up of most of the Jews in Jerusalem by an earthquake.

"The Giving Up of Pilate" describes the fate of the procurator on his return to Rome. Cæsar (Claudius, or the dead Tiberius) was not satisfied with Pilate's apology before the senate, and declared his own conviction that Jesus was the Christ, the King of the Jews; whereupon all the Roman gods fell down and became as dust before him. Again Pilate was brought before the senate and condemned to death. When his head was struck off an angel came to take it, at the sight of which Pilate's wife died for joy.

"The Death of Pilate" tells a different story. The Emperor Tiberius, being ill, wanted Pilate to send Jesus to cure him. But Jesus being dead, the governor procured his portrait, painted for Veronica (vera icon, "true image"), which, being sent to Rome, the sight of it cured Tiberius. Then Pilate was summoned to Rome to answer for crucifying Christ. He appeared wearing the seamless tunic of Jesus, which, while worn, protected him from the rage of the deceased emperor. But he was stripped and condemned to death, and to escape the sentence he killed himself with a knife. His body was first sunk in the Tiber, and then in the Rhone, but it caused such a disturbance that it was buried in the mountains of Switzerland. According to another tradition, Pilate was banished to Gaul, and drowned himself in Lake Lucerne. There is a monument at Vienna on the Rhone, called Pilate's tomb.

"The Narrativ of Joseph," of Arimathea, givs a particular account of the arrest of Jesus, and describes the entry of the penitent thief into Paradise. Judas was employed as a detectiv by Caiaphas for two years to shadow Jesus, who was at last arrested on a charge of stealing the law, and renouncing the Mosaic ordinances. The only witness in court was Judas himself. Jesus answered nothing. The law had, in fact, been stolen by Demas, one of the thieves afterward crucified with Jesus. He, being penitent on the cross, was not only promised immediate admission into paradise, but Jesus gave him a letter of introduction to the gate-keepers. The body of Demas vanished on the cross, while that of Gestas, the other thief, took the form of a dragon. Joseph put the body of Jesus in a tomb. The Jews then put Joseph in prison. At 11 o'clock the next night (Saturday), Joseph was miraculously released. Jesus was there, and so was Demas, who had been to Paradise and brought back an answer to the letter of Jesus. Joseph followed them to Galilee, where he saw Christ ministered to by angels. After three days John came and was introduced to Demas by Jesus. Then a multitude of heavenly voices welcomed the robber to Paradise again, and Joseph found himself in his own house.

"The Avenging of the Savior" is the craziest of all these early fabrications. Nathan, a sea captain, sails from Judea with a treaty to Tiberius. He is driven by adverse winds to the coast of Africa, where he meets Titus, a prince of Burgidalla, who has a cancer in his nose. Titus asks Nathan if he can cure it. Nathan says he cannot, but if Emanuel, who was lately crucified in Jerusalem, were alive, he could hav done it. The story of the crucifixion, as related by Nathan, so enraged Titus against the Jews that he sent for his father, Vespasian, to come with 5,000 men and lay waste Judea. The army went. Archelaus (!) abdicated and killed himself. The soldiers of four other kings killed each other to the number of 12,000. The kings confessed the crime of delivering up Christ to death (some forty years before), and Pilate (!) was put in prison. Tiberius, who was afflicted with leprosy, was induced to send a messenger to find a disciple of Christ who could cure him. The messenger only succeeded in getting the Veronica portrait, at the sight of which, on his return to Rome, the emperor was cured. Tiberius was then baptized by Captain Nathan, and became the first Christian emperor!

More than a dozen ancient books now entitled "Apocryphal Acts," and half a dozen "Apocryphal Revelations," are published in the Antenicene Christian Library, all marvelous and silly. For a brief epitome of them see chapter xlii of our "Revelations."

The story of Clement of Rome is an ancient religious novel of peculiar interest, coming down to us in two versions. It is condensed from 400 pages to 50 in our "Revelations." Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin Mary in the days of Augustus Cæsar, and crucified under Pontius Pilate, is a creation of the second century.

Pontius Pilate is named in only one of the New Testament epistles, namely, 1 Timothy, which epistle is regarded by many scholars, some of them orthodox, as a forgery of the second century.

The Apocalypse of John has the lamb slain from the foundation of the world, and our Lord crucified in "the great city spiritually called Sodom and Egypt."

There is no allusion to the Virgin mother or infant Jesus in the writings of the apostolic fathers, until we come down to the epistles of Ignatius, which are certainly spurious, and a product of the second or third century.

Justin Martyr, the earliest of the authenticated non-apostolic fathers, was contemporary with Polycarp and Papias.

Justin appears to be the first to recognize Jesus as born of a virgin and crucified under Pontius Pilate. His source of information appears to hav been some earlier gospel than any of our four, and the apocryphal "Acts of Pilate."

Marcion, the Gnostic, was contemporary with Justin at Rome. Marcion used Paul's epistles (except those to Timothy and Titus); Justin did not recognize Paul, or even allude to him.

Tatian, a disciple of Justin, after embracing Christianity renounced the doctrin of the humanity of Christ, and became a Gnostic at Antioch.

Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, A.D., 168–181, in his work of 40 pages, never mentions Jesus Christ, and ridicules the idea that a god can be born. His Christ was simply the Logos.

Athenagoras, A.D. 177, in his work of 80 pages, nowhere mentions Christ.

The humanity of Christ appears to hav been recognized by Papias and Hegessippus about or after the middle of the second century.

The humanity of Christ comes out clearly in the writings of the three great contemporary fathers who wrote in the last quarter of the second century and beginning of the third, namely, Irenæus, of Lyons; Clement, of Alexandria, and Tertullian, of Carthage.

After their time Gnosticism was suppressed.

Irenæus, though believing that Christ was crucified under Pontius Pilate, made the singular blunder of insisting that Jesus was an old man. And Irenæus's disciple Hippolytus repeated the same blunder.

Josephus knew no Paul or other apostles. He was past twenty-one years of age when, according to the marginal chronology of the book of Acts, Paul made his last visit to Jerusalem, and yet no trace of any knowledge of the exciting events narrated in that book are found in the writings of the Jewish historian.

Josephus went to Rome A.D. 62 or 63 to intercede for certain priests put in bonds by Felix. It was at the very time that Paul is supposed to hav gone to Rome in bonds. Why did he not find Paul there, and why did he not tell us something about the ministry of the apostle Paul there?

Many of these points are repeated and elaborated in this volume, and much additional proof is adduced. In a diligent study of this subject for more than a dozen years, no fact has been found incompatible with the postulate that there was no Jesus Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate, but, on the other hand, we hav found many further traces of a Jesus, his disciples, and their contemporaries, a hundred years before, some of whom are clearly identified with those named in the book of Acts.

The Truth Seeker Forever.

A HUNDRED THOUSAND OR MORE.

The contributions of Mr. Frederic Harrison, in recent numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, are worth the price of its subscription a dozen years or more. And so, indeed, I might truthfully say of every single issue of this free and independent sheet, from the first number ever published by its immortal editor. And this I affirm, in full view of the conviction I hav long entertained, that the masses, spell-bound by Christianity, never know when they are confuted. And what opinion shall we form of a man, when we see his heels knocked from under him and he lies flat upon the ground and yet does not comprehend what has befallen his person? And while any and each number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in my opinion, contains moral dynamite enough to explode all the mystic balloons in Christendom, its victims are not in a state of mind to be reached by any such power. As a general rule, it is of no use to show Christians how they hav certainly been bamboozled "by faith in things unseen." And now, while the Holy Ghost, and all the popes, bishops, and priests, hav had an "open ring and fair play" against humanity for thousands of years, it is safe to say that the battle for truth has been successfully fought against all gods and devils, and the victory won. No one now, as in aforetime, can be put to death on the false charge of witchcraft. No one now can be compelled to kiss the cross by having red-hot lead poured into his ears. No Christian church can now, as formerly, tie their victim to a tree and strip each muscle from his bones to convince him of "divine love." The bloody battle of Armageddon and all the "saintly beasts" has succeeded, and Humanity's right arm of power now waves on high its white flag of victory. Her apostles and heralds are now heard in all lands. They are as holy, good, and true as any saint whose feet ever trod upon this earth. There is not one Freethought speaker who is not as really "inspired" as ever St. Paul was. Thus of D. M. Bennett, Harrison, Remsburg, Wakeman, Putnam, Watts, Reynolds, York, Mrs. Lake, Mrs. Severance, Ingersoll, Palmer, and a thousand more I could name of humanity's "inspired apostles." Nor is there a single issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other free and independent paper which does not contain thunder and forked lightning enough to awaken and startle the world, if that can be done by the truth, and argument, and the lights of science shed upon the dark errors of the past.

Is "possession nine points in law?" All this advantage superstition has had. Nor can the Christian mind be controled by two opposing ideas at one and the same time. And yet, if we compare the present age with the barbarianism of humanity's youth, it is manifest what victories, what mighty strides, the race has made within a hundred years past. Freethought has now a majority. Humanity, as a unit, was always opposed to superstition. And if all the Liberals in these Uunited States and Canada were invited, the list of THE TRUTH SEEKER could be easily raised to one hundred thousand or more. And now is the time to strike for this free and independent sheet, that has the capacity for publishing the matter that has appeared in its columns within a month or two past. It pleads for humanity. And when you ask a subscription for it, there is a living chord in every matured heart that throbs aloud at every whisper from the lips that never yet were closed against human woe.

And now, in view of the new year, let subscription papers for this noble object be prepared and sent with each paper. And there are Freethought people enough in this nation who take no other paper to raise the list to one hundred thousand. Let this be done. LAROY SUNDERLAND.

Quincy, Mass., Nov. 18, 1884.

To Be versus Not to Be.

The oft-repeated inquiry, "Does death end all?" a very prominent Liberal responds to in the affirmativ, with an assurance nowhere eclipsed, and only equaled in egotism by an imaginary being the creation of Byron's brain.

He makes the sultan of Turkey to say "he could see with his own eyes the moon was round, but he was certain that the earth was square because he had traveled fifty miles, and found no sign that it was circular anywhere."

From another comes this stereotyped pet phrase relativ to the same subject: "One world at a time." This summary manner of disposing of the question of man's future destiny is an indication of mental deficiency.

The sentiment would be philosophical if voiced for the brute, to whose limited range of thought and destiny it aptly applies, but is eminently sophistical emanating from the human, whose superior mental faculties render him capable of taking note of our relations to the outer sphere of our present abode ordinarily denominated another world.

When it shall be generally known that this indisposition to investigate, or be concerned about the future of man, is due to a mental defect as susceptible of demonstration as the very apparent deficiency of the reasoning capacity is a sure sign of idiocy, the anti-Spiritualists will not boast dogmatically, but, with the exemplary modesty of the good reasoner, will frankly admit that they don't know.

These "don't knows" would do well to as speedily as possible practice the old but consistent precept, "Man, know thyself."

A thorough acquaintance with the normal mental ability of the human race furnishes greater evidence of our relations to the outer sphere, or, as named, the other world, and the possibility of our participating in the enjoyment of another or continuous life, than all the myth-theologies, biblical included, that were ever produced. A great need of the day is a thorough knowledge of the normal function of every convolution of the human brain; their normal, harmonical exercise is of the very highest importance to the races to secure happiness on this plane and in the sphere beyond.

The diffusion of such knowledge would be a fertil field for laborers in the humanitarian cause. Can we hav any higher standard of right than the spontaneous outcome of the normal harmonical exercise of the human brain? It is the perversion of our faculties which makes it appear that the causator's most perfect work on this plane is a failure.

The demolition of what is called revealed religion does not necessarily extinguish Othello's occupation. The black-coated would-be teachers of the people can take heart; there is ample scope for the exercise of talent, if they hav it, by dilating on the errors the races hav been steeped in for the ages past. In place of a book let them study and expatiate on the possibilities inherent in man. The human race is the most perfect revelation of supermundane intelligence and a future state.

Through modern investigation into the laws of mind, it is scientifically proven that indestructibly graven in man's mental structure are the proofs of our relation to the outer or spiritual plane. Among all the orders of animal creation below man, there is no phase of mental development where there is not the recognized appropriate avenues for its exercising; there is no exception to this law of mind. Let this fact be distinctly recognized, and the grand work of man's spiritual destiny is susceptible of logical proof.

Man's mental superiority to the lower orders, in his capacity to construct and manifest skill akin to divine intelligence, is not the ultimate of man's mental make-up; he is endowed with mental faculties, superior in position, hence, it is inferable, more exalted in function, than the faculties that find their appropriate aliment (opportunity for their individual or collectiv exercise) in the nigh inexhaustible supply in material nature. This superior group of mental faculties, which group it is that pre-eminently distinguishes man as superior to all other known creations, when normally activ does not find in material nature its appropriate mental pabulum; hence the logical inference is, that in the universe, imperceptible to the five senses, there exist the conditions on which this department of our mentality is as legitimately exercised as are all the other recognized inferior faculties activ on the visible material plane.

Brooklyn, N. Y. AMELIA K. COOK.

How to Save Our Souls.

Said a gentleman to me, recently, "I hav had what I consider incontrovertible evidence of the truth of Spiritualism, but, though new to it, hav seen some disastrous results from connection with it. I hav long been done with orthodoxy. I am shocked at and dissatisfied with Materialism; tell me where, between the two extremes of all hereafter, and no hereafter, shall wisdom and common sense abide." I hav found that the way to get at any truth is to approach it in its nearest aspects.

Then where are we to-day? In this world, related to this world's methods.

I am a Spiritualist, or, as a wise one has said elsewhere, an immortalist. With those who insist they hav no souls, I hav no quarrel, but do not consider it any part of my present business to attempt to convince them that they hav, since I care nothing at all whether they hav it or not. Let them sleep until the life within shall awaken them.

I am an immortalist. I hav the proof of at least two worlds within me and without me, and know that the number is limited only by my limited comprehension. And I say that whatever teaching I may hav received from the spirit side, which I hav not instantly and generally appropriated to the every-day uses and needs of this world, has been to me a bewilderment, a hindrance—often a curse. Any and every attempt to set aside this world, its methods, its language, its nearer interpretations; to litter up the narrow passages through which my feet must walk to perform their daily duties, with the furniture of my future spirit existence, has proven to me a stumbling-block, an obstacle, a barrier which compelled me to retrace all my steps, and approach the inevitable earthly toll-gate with the earthly coin, the notice over it being always, "No promissory scrip taken here."

Whatever information we gain from any sphere must be translated into our little every-day language, and fitted to present use, or it is rubbish, as were even pearls and diamonds to a hungry man in a land where they could not be exchanged for bread.

If the highest seraph could stoop to us from the loftiest heaven, and whisper in our ear that which would make us less content in our duty of to-day; if he could not tell us that which would make us a stronger and healthier individuality in the needs of to-day, his message were an impertinence. If he says to us, "Hold with feeble grasp to the earthly atoms, and giv to me thyself that, through it, I may blow my own trumpet, and tell thee of thy glorious future," is he any better than orthodoxy, which says, "Thou art nothing but a preparation for hell, therefore empty thyself of thyself, and be thou filled with the ghostly divinity of God, awaiting his pleasure to damn or save thee as he will," the saving after his fashion, entre nous, being little less desirable than the damning? Then, too, if we permit ourselvs to be emptied utterly of ourselvs to be filled with a holy ghost, we open the door for an unholy one the moment conditions may suit him to enter. It is best, therefore, always to hold the citadel, the only one which is our own in time or eternity, and without which we and all things are chaos, and "uncreated night." All harmony may peal her rapturous notes through all her organs in space—we are not ear if some spirit has appropriated it to Grandmother Ann that she may babble into it some triviality. The prescient future may write the glories of the coming day upon every bud in nature—we are not eye; some spirit needed our eyes more than we, and appropriated them that he might find a new path into heaven, and steal into the back windows like a thief and a robber, instead of going over the briar patch which his own sins hav made for him. Faith and hope and wisdom may whisper to our understanding; may sound their grand, restful music along the nerves of our emotions, but message and music reach us all "jangled out of tune and harsh." We hav permitted influences foreign, low, and hostil to make a highway of us, if the white purity of our souls be soiled with impudent "familiar spirits." No one, not even the very devil himself, is in the least benefited by these operations, as I take it he requires the truth as much as any any of us, and in the direction of reformation I utterly repudiate any plan of salvation which leaves him out.

I hav known of a man who in earth life exercised all the power of his strong will upon his beloved daughter to bend her exactly to his idea of what she should be, her own being often the reverse of his, and when he passed to spirit life, though he saw his mistake, he was obliged to continue to harass her, to becloud her mental atmosphere with the olden authority, to hinder her feet in the ways which should and would hav been blessed with the olden restraints. This he was from habit obliged to do, though he saw his mistakes, and loathed them. And in his agony at the bonds which every breath and thought of a lifetime had so industriously riveted, he cried out with so loud a cry that her ears heard him. But even then she could not free herself, except little by little, day by day, as the soul within her grew stronger by exercise of the pinions hastening to good deeds, to works of love, to the opening of doors to other souls in prison, to incessant flutters in the wide, free, warm, glorious air which stoops to embrace every soul, whether in or out of prison, in the universe.

Let us then deal with spirits and the spiritual problem after the same common-sense fashion which we deal with mortals. Let us not mortgage our souls to them for a quarter-section in spirit-land, thinking that either they or we will be benefited by the operation. Let us listen to them, but not surrender wholly our ears. Let us giv to them our attention, and such use of our material atoms as they may need to manifest themselvs, without disorganizing ourselvs. Let us lend them the wings of our intuition if they need them to reach our lowlands, but at the same time, after the transaction is over, let our intellect take occasion to sift the whole matter, and see if what remains be wheat, or only chaff. Let us soar and stoop, climb and rest, stretch every nerve toward that unknown vastness which holds our own destiny, our own unfoldment, but always try to be sure that we can come safely and honestly home to a night's lodging upon our Mother Earth, giving her no cause to be ashamed of us. Let us teach our children principles rather than phenomena. Teach them, as Carlyle said to his brother, "to shun a lie as they would hell fire," and after that is well drilled into them, let their little souls go unhampered of beliefs. Let them search out their wonders for themselvs, in their own way, if you wish a truer and clearer exposition of phenomena than is yet known. Let the protecting husk of a body grow strong about them, and never seek to force the soul at the expense of it, unless you wish for worm-eaten fruit. The goody-goody Sunday-school boys and girls always die young and inanely, flabby and long-jointed, from stretching too far into heaven before they are called for or wanted.

Finally, if we are to do the work of spirits rather than our own, this proxy business is likely to go on forever; whereas if we begin to-day, if we hav not before, to treat the spiritual world just precisely as this earth treats the sky, the sun, the moon, all that is above and beyond her, receiving their life, giving influences to quicken and beautify her own eternal processes, we should not hav such a melancholy number of persons going about and affirming vehemently that they hav no souls. Horace Has Him!

From the Investigator.

We lately asked the editor of the Catholic Citizen if his church granted indulgences for crimes. We hav often heard and read that it did, but being somewhat in doubt if it really could be so wicked, we asked for more information, and the editor replies as follows:

"The Boston Investigator rises for information, and asks us whether indulgences, such as set a price for murder, etc., are now granted, or were ever granted, by the Catholic church? We answer, 'No!' to both questions, Mr. Investigator, No! decidedly—No! And you cannot produce any Catholic authority to substantiate such foul allusions; they are merely 'Reformation' campaign lies."

We can cite half a dozen Protestant authorities to prove that Pope Leo X. in 1517 did grant all kinds of indulgences, with prices affixed, for the purpose of raising money with which to complete the church of St. Peter's at Rome. But as Protestant authority will not be acceptable to our Catholic contemporary, we ask his attention to the following which we find in a Catholic book called, "The Tax of the Sacred Roman Chancery." In this book are contained the exact sums to be levied for the pardon of each particular sin named, and some of the fees are thus stated:

"For procuring abortion, 7s. 6d.; simony, 10s. 6d.; sacrilege, 10s. 6d.; perjury, 9s.; robbing, 12s.; burning a neighbor's house, 12s.; murdering a layman, 7s. 6d.; laying violent hands on a clergyman, 10s. 6d. And so on."

We giv this quotation from "The Sacred Roman Chancery" more for the purpose of inquiring of our Catholic friend of Milwaukee what it means, or whether there is any truth in it, than from any other purpose. And in his answer will he please tell us what his church intends by granting indulgences? As we understand the meaning of indulgence in the Roman Catholic church, it signifies the remission of the punishment due to sins, granted by the pope or church, and supposed to save the sinner from purgatory. Is this correct, and is there any sum of money to be paid, or any kind of equivalent to be rendered, for the "remission?" We would not misrepresent, but would like to know (if we are in error) how the doctrin of "indulgence" originated, and exactly what it means at the present time if allowed.

Canadian Notes.

A Roman Catholic priest, Father Eagan, is being tried in Toronto for ejecting one of his parishioners out of his pew and out of the building with such violence as to break the old man's leg, besides inflicting further injuries on the harmless, defenseless, aged parishioner, who was over seventy years old. "Of such is the Christian kingdom of heaven!"

The great Dominion Convention of Freethinkers on Dec. 13, 1884, will be addressed by nativ Canadian speakers, besides Putnam, Remsburg, and "the apostle of Secularism," Charles Watts.

The Christian clergy endeavor to establish various monopolies. One is the monopoly of paying no taxes. And by so doing they rob the poor laboring population of a portion of their daily dollar. They seek to establish a monopoly of books written by God, in the face of the fact that their God's books are only copies of older gods' books, of more ancient pagan religions.

A Protestant clergyman is being tried in Canada for committing a violent assault on a person who had offended him. He beat and bruised his victim in an unmerciful manner on the public street of the town. "If thine enemy smite thee on one cheek, turn to him the other also."

Christians claim a monopoly of a crucified Christ, savior of men, although the Christian Christ is only an imitation of two or three dozen more ancient crucified Christs, saviors of men, besides an indefinit number of uncrucified Christs of older pagan religions, a belief in the blood and sacrifice of each and every one of them being the only means of attaining salvation.

The Toronto public press reports a case of the elopement of a female captain of the Salvation Army with a male soldier of the rank and file, who leaves a wife and children in the city. "Except ye be ready to leave wife and family for my sake, ye are not worthy of me."

Last Sunday a lecture was delivered from the platform of Albert Hall on the subject of evolution as taught by Spencer, Haeckel, Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Clifford, Fisk, and others of the very greatest of the scientists, specialists, and philosophers of the last thirty years. Evolution has now become the prevailing philosophy of the period, and is adhered to by many eminent clergymen of the Christian church. It is admitted to be the only theory which accounts for all the facts of the universe. It is a scientific hypothesis based on a great many thousands of demonstrable, analyzable, positiv facts.

A poem recently published givs an account of the adventures of Balder the Beautiful, the Scandinavian Christ, savior of men. After his death he meets with Jesus of Nazareth, the Christian Christ, in the world beyond the grave, and they talk over matters together, rejoicing over the good things they had done for humanity. In the other world they will probably get up a convention of these multitudinous and various crucified Christs of the pagan and Christian religions. They could hold a conversazione, hav a shake-hands all round, and enjoy a good time in general.

Gibbon says the various modes of worship which prevailed in the Roman world were all considered by the people as equally true—by the philosophers as equally false—and by the thoughtless as equally useful. Both the interests of the priests and the credulity of the people were sufficiently respected. In their writings and conversation the philosophers of antiquity asserted the independent dignity of reason. But they resigned their actions to the commands of law and custom. Viewing with a smile of pity and indulgence the various errors of the vulgar —they diligently practiced the ceremonies of their fathers, devoutly frequented the temples of the gods —and sometimes condescending to act a part on the theater of superstition—they concealed the sentiments of an Atheist under the sacerdotal robe. Reasoners of such a temper were scarcely inclined to wrangle about their respectiv modes of faith or worship. It was indifferent to them what shape the folly of the multitude might choose to assume, and they approached with the same inward contempt and the same exterior reverence to the altars of the Lybyan, the Olympian, the Christian, or the Capitoline Jove. It was a common adage among the Greeks, "Miracles for fools;" and among the Romans, "The common people like to be deceived—deceived let them be." The above description is intensely suggestiv. Does it apply to the Christian clergy of our own times?

The Toronto Christian Guardian newspaper, and Talmage in New York, hav been saying that the evolution philosophy is dying out. The old proverb says, "As the fool thinketh, so the bell tinketh;" "The wish is father to the thought." The evolution philosophy is the most deadly foe that the barbarous superstitions of Christianity has ever yet encountered. The doom of the vain imaginings and tomfooleries of theology was sealed by the advent of Darwinism.

Mosheim says that one thing appears at first sight very remarkable, that the variety of gods of the pagan world prior to Christianity, neither produced wars nor discussions among the various nations. Each nation suffered its neighbors to follow their own method of worship, to adore their gods, to enjoy their own rites and ceremonies, and discovered no displeasure at the diversity of sentiment in religious matters. They looked upon all the world as one great empire, divided into various provinces, over every one of which a certain order of divinities presided, and that therefore none could behold with contempt the gods of other nations, or force strangers to pay homage to their own. The Romans exercised this universal toleration in the completest manner.

The science class of the Toronto Secular Society hav been studying geology and animal physiology. On Tuesday last they had an interesting discussion on evolution. This class is found to be the most useful and most interesting thing belonging to the society.

The newspapers of Toronto are exercised over a Salvation Army episode. They say that accusations are made by several different persons who claim to be eye-witnesses. They are unanimous in their testimony that a male captain in the Army (whose occupation is body-snatching from the devil) prefers saying his prayers in the room of a female coworker. R. B. Butland.

The Liberal Club.

Owing to exigencies connected with a proper observance of Thanksgiving Day, the reporter was unable to attend the last meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. A full report of its proceedings is, therefore, impracticable. The following suggestiv letter from an esteemed correspondent will, perhaps, more than supply the omission:

TWO WAYS OF TREATING CHOLERA.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Passing Jefferson Hall, between Fifteenth and Sixteenth streets, avenue A, last Sunday evening, and noticing a number of sturdy policemen surrounding the door, and getting no answer to my question as to "what's the trouble," I walked in. The hall was well filled with people consisting of young men and boys from ten to twenty years of age, with, perhaps, half a dozen aged men and a dozen middle-aged women beside the speakers. When I entered in, the congregation were singing, accompanied by a cracked piano. Each young gamin seemed to be striving to drown the piano, whose rattling music, drawn out by a very sharp-nosed lady, sounded very much like the combination yell of the black-and-tan and bull-dog pup at the late dog exhibition in Madison Square Garden. The speakers portrayed the horrors of hell, the extreme heat of its fires, the salubrious climate of heaven, the beauty of its pavements, which, it was claimed, you could tramp from everlasting to everlasting and no "cop's" around to arrest you under the tramp law. The vivid description each gave of these two countries indicated personal knowledge, and would beat a Boston real estate dealer describing the productivness of a Vermont farm and the barrenness of Cape Cod. The speaking had little apparent effect on the Tammany "heelers" of avenue A. Finally, a reverend looking gentleman arose in great consternation, and announced that the cholera was coming, which, he claimed, was worse than the small-pox. He worked this "racket" for its full value. The cholera would tie up one's insides in hard knots, which it would be impossible to unravel, and such would be his pain that hell would be relief.

On the Friday evening following I strolled into the Liberal Club and listened to a lecture by Professor Eckles, M.D., giving a history of cholera, its growth from the first knowledge of the disease; its late appearance in France, the new discoveries in combating its progress, and its cure. Indeed, his whole lecture evinced that he had made the subject one of great study and scientific research. The learned doctor did not seem to care the snap of my thumb what became of us after we had died of the cholera, but paid attention to the question how to prevent our dying. Please tell us which of these two methods of treating cholera is preferable. Paxton.

We hav received Miss Wixon's new novel, "All in a Lifetime"—a handsome publication, price $1.50. It will be given more extended notice next week.

How to Choose the President.

The objection to the popular vote system in choosing a President is insuperable. Suppose the vote should be very close? In that case a charge of fraud would endanger the Republic. Again, suppose one state should be so much in the hands of one party that it could by force or fraud make its vote almost unanimous. Or, suppose a solid South, or a solid East or West. It could control every presidential election. No! The Fathers of this Republic were infinitly wiser than the men who clamor for the popular vote.

But the same objection rises where one state has such a very large electoral vote as to make it virtually the controller of every election, as New York is now. We hav just escaped a great danger and one liable to recur. It is shameful to run such risk of civic strife every four years. How can we escape it? The only feasible plan seems to be this one: Let us vote for our electors as we do for our Congressmen. Let each Congressional district, or other district, vote for its presidential elector. This will prevent all undue excitement and all danger of any such close vote ruling the choice as has just occurred. The real strife and excitement will be transferred to the electoral college. We hope and pray as we love our country and its institutions, that this truly wise plan shall ere long be adopted. In that case there will never be more excitement attending a presidential election than does now attend elections for Congressmen. It is the true mean between the two extremes of popular vote and the present plan. Holt.

Lectures and Meetings.

John E. Remsburg's appointments for December are as follows: Milwaukee, 5th to 7th; Toronto, 13th to 15th; Montreal, 18th; Whitehall, N. Y., 19th; Albany, 21; Cedarville, N. Y., 22d to 25th, and Boston, 28th.

W. F. Jamieson gave six lectures in Seward, Neb.; three in Ulysses, Neb., and one in Milwaukee, Wis. He is engaged to deliver five lectures in Mitchell, Dak., Nov. 30th and Dec. 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th; five (a second course), in Wentworth, Dak., Dec. 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, and five in Currie, Minn., Dec. 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th. Address him at Pipestone, Minn.

We call attention to Mr. Charles Watts's list of lecturing engagements, which appears in another column. As this will be the only tour Mr. Watts can make this season through the districts announced, we hope the Liberal friends in the Western states will secure his services at once. Mr. S. P. Putnam will accompany him with a view of forming auxiliaries of the National Liberal League. All communications for Mr. Watts up to the end of January next should be addressed care of Mr. J. A. Risser, 9 Opera House Building, Toronto, Ont., Can.

Rowley-Remsburg Debate.—This debate opened in the Opera House Tuesday night, with a fair audience. Rev. Rowley selected Thomas H. Lake to look after his interests, Mr. Remsburg called on Maj. S. N. Bradford to perform a like service for him, and these two chose J. T. Kinnavan to see that there was fair play all around. Both disputants are good speakers, well versed in the art of debate, and both well posted in the historical facts necessary for a controversial handling of Biblical subjects. Mr. Remsburg appears the more elegant talker of the two, though Mr. Rowley speaks well, and with an earnestness that pleases his hearers. Wednesday and Thursday nights gave an increased attendance over the first night, and the interest seemed enlarging. As to the good done Christianity, or the hurt done Infidelity, through this battle of brains, time will probably show.

The debate was carried on in the most gentlemanly manner, all the established rules being strictly observed by both sides, and nothing of an ugly nature was manifested at any time.—Stewartsville Independent.

We are glad indeed to see one gleam of common sense in a church paper concerning the mixing of politics and religion in the intolerant manner of the campaign just closed. The Presbyterian of the 15th inst. thus speaks:

"Clergymen mingling in the political fray do not clarify politics; they are rather stained by the contact. One mistake made by a party of good men has gained wide celebrity. A large delegation of ministers waited, as a band of ministers, upon one of the presidential candidates, in the city of New York, probably at the suggestion of some sharp, managing politician, who thought he was doing a neat thing in campaigning. An excellent brother—an Israelite, indeed, in whom there was no guile—was put forward as the representativ of the clergymen, and in a few sentences he managed to damage the cause of his candidate badly. He was quite too sincere a man for the boiling currents and guileful ways of political strife. But was not the great blunder the presence of that company of clergymen, as clergymen, in that place at that time? Everyone of them had a right, as a citizen, to greet the representativ of his party; but had they any right to take their official robes into the hurly-burly of political strife? It may just possibly be, however, that we are endeavoring to point a moral which has already sunk deep into the hearts of our public men. It may possibly hav already occurred to the great politicians that the mingling of the clergy in activ politics, after the fashion of the New York ministers, is dangerous, and may prove to be like a pound of dynamite under a goodly structure."

But would the Presbyterian hav spoken thus had the other gentleman been elected? Defeat oft makes men wise, and these words before November 4th would hav had more weight than now in convincing people that they are the expression of patriotism, and not salve to soothe the irritation the church feels at not having a potent influence with the next administration through its aid in choosing it.

A Magnificent Field Day.

The series of meeting held in Philadelphia on Sunday, Nov. 30th, were the most crowded and auspicious of the campaign. A full house greeted Mr. Watts in the morning at Memorial Hall when he gave his excellent discourse on "Agnosticism." After its delivery there was a lively debate carried on, quite good naturedly, however, and creating quite a harmonious feeling in favor of the practical work of the League. In response to the appeal of the secretary, nearly a hundred dollars were contributed to the Campaign Fund.

In the afternoon every seat was occupied, and Mr. Putnam gave his address on "The New Work of Liberalism in America," wherein he briefly expounded the four grand aspects of the work of the future—the political, the educational, the moral, and the ideal. The lecture was received with the utmost cordiality, and no doubt expressed in outline what by common consent must be the civilization of the future, and the methods by which it will be attained. At its conclusion, Dr. R. B. Westbrook made one of his bright, brief speeches on "Action," which must now, he said, be the aim of the Liberal world. Now is the time to do something. We hav had the gospels; the next in order is the acts. He expressed the heartiest sympathy with the new and aggressiv movement of Liberalism, and predicted its grand success. He showed the sincerity and nobility of his spirit by giving at once ten dollars to the Campaign Fund, and pledging five hundred dollars for the purchase of a building in Philadelphia which should be devoted to Liberal propaganda. Dr. Westbrook is a Liberal indeed—a Rationalistic Theist he calls himself—and really there is but little difference between that sort of Thesim and the Agnosticism of Charles Watts. At any rate, these two beliefs can work harmoniously together for the progress of humanity. Dr. Westbrook, like Mr. Savage, of Boston, is doing a needed work in rationalizing the minds of those who are fast breaking away from the old dogmas. He is to giv a series of lectures this winter on "Christianity," and no doubt he will strike many a telling blow in favor of science and against superstition. He will carry our banner with an unflinching hand, and under the garb of the philosopher will be a notable soldier of liberty and humanity.

What shall I say of the evening meeting? It was the largest crowd yet. Long before the hour of beginning every seat was taken, and then other seats had to be brought in, and still the people came surging in until the platform itself was covered with eager listeners. After some music and a recitation by Mr. Johnson, Mr. Watts gave his famous lecture, "The Bible and Science." The claims of the Bible as opposed to the truth of science were thoroughly examined and their absurdity fully demonstrated. The lecture was full of brilliant wit and telling points, and the audience were fairly carried away with applause. But charming as the lecture in itself was, it was succeeded by a display of oratory and sparkling repartee which was a rare treat to all those that witnessed it. A Rev. Mr. Ware, a very bright and shrewd Methodist minister of the African persuasion and color, answered Mr. Watts, and it must be confessed that he made some pretty good hits in favor of orthodoxy, and presented his side of the queston in a very gentlemanly and interesting way, which was quite agreeable even to a Liberal audience, for evidently Mr. Ware is a man of broad culture and genial soul. Another opponent of Mr. Watts was not so fortunate in his method. He tried a bit of abuse, and laid himself open to a fearful punishment, which Mr. Watts inflicted in his closing reply with unflinching justice. The poor man was literally flayed alive with the caustic wit and keen argument of Mr. Watts. All the flimsy pretensions and defenses of Christianity were destroyed and the real facts of history were vindicated. The exponent of Christianity referred to the stock argument of Christians, the frightful excesses of the French Revolution.

In reply, Mr. Watts showed that the excesses were the result of foreign interference, backed up by Christian bayonets, and that long before the revolution under the regime of Christianity the streets of Paris were red with the blood of innocent victims. The defender of orthodox tried to deny these proofs, and interrupted Mr. Watts in his speech, and declared that he had "the facts in his pocket." Quick as lightning Mr. Watts responded that evidently his facts were in his pocket and not in his head, and from the manner of his talk, without doubt they always stayed in his pocket and never benefited his head. This brought down the house with a storm of applause, and the man of "facts-in-his-pocket" subsided and Mr. Watts closed the debate in peace. Everybody was delighted, and the great throng dispersed with a desire to hear more of Mr. Watts's stirring eloquence. Some came fifty miles to hear him, and will come the same distance again whenever he is announced to speak in Philadelphia. There were many from out out of town, who have received an impulse which will produce good fruit in all the neighboring country. George Longford, secretary of the League, did yeoman service in making preparations for these great meetings. There is a body of Liberals in the "City of Brotherly Love" good and stanch as ever breathed the breath of heaven. They are going forward to success, and they will make Philadelphia a banner city in the cause of freedom. It contains the elements of a most flourishing growth. The Declaration of Independence will receive new life from the place of its birth.

The total amount of the subscriptions for the day were $154.75, showing how deeply interested our Philadelphia friends are in the national organization and work.

Important Action of the Board of Directors.

At a special meeting of the board of directors of the National Liberal League, held at the office of the treasurer, 850 Broadway, New York, on Friday, Nov. 28, 1884, at 2 o'clock P.M., First Vice-president Charles Watts presiding, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, chairman of the finance committee, reported having, with chairman of the executiv committee, audited the accounts of the secretary.

Total amount pledged and contributed to date, Nov. 28th, $2,227.21. Cash received by secretary, $567.58. Expense account, $189.02. Paid over to treasurer, $378.56.

Motion made and seconded, "That the treasurer be and hereby is authorized and requested to hav necessary circular printed and sent to all who hav pledged quarterly payments, asking them to remit." Carried.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Watts:

Resolved, That in compliance with the requirements of the constitution, Art. XVIII., Amendment 5, unanimously adopted by the Seventh Aunual Congress, held at Milwaukee September, 1883: "Every auxiliary League is requested to contribute a certain sum monthly, not less than five cents per month from each one of its members, for the use of the National League. The amount thus collected should be remitted quarterly, on the first day of January, April, July, and October, by the secretary of the auxiliary, to the secretary of the National League," the chairman of the finance committee be and is hereby requested to hav circulars printed, and mail one to the secretary of each League, requesting remittance of the five cents per month per head for each member.

Carried.

The chairman of the executiv committee was called on to report plan of work to promote efficient organization, secure social and educational advantages to local Leagues, and render local, district, state, and the National League financially self-sustaining.

The chairman of the executiv committee reported as follows:

Each state should be organized as a state League. (Where this is not yet practicable for lack of numbers, two or more states might form joint state League.) Each state should be divided into districts, and the best, most energetic, and self-sacrificing workers, women and men, be appointed, or elected, officers of the district Leagues, with especial view to their ability to aid and encourage the formation of new local Leagues. Each district League to hold regular quarterly meetings of all local Leagues in its territory; one or more officers of the state League, or their representativs, to be present to advise and consult as to best methods of carrying on the work.

Lecturers should attend district League meetings, to speak on some subject in which people are then most interested—subjects decided by vote of local League officers.

At each district quarterly meeting, the secretary shall read sums total of work accomplished by each League during the quarter; number of pages of leaflets and publications distributed, loaned, or sold; number of new subscribers to Liberal papers obtained; number of new members, etc. The National Liberal League should cause to be prepared leaflets on each of the Nine Demands of Liberalism, setting forth the facts and arguments in such a way as shall awake to thought, without arousing the ire of even devout Bible worshipers—leaflets that shall be of such interest as to be read and reread with avidity by all classes.

Each and every member of a local League, in addition to and irrespectiv of any other contributions, shall pay twenty-five cents each month to secretary of local League, in return for which members so paying shall receive full twenty-five cents worth—at ten per cent less than publisher's prices—of such leaflets, or such other Liberal literature as may be from time to time needed for missionary work.

Eight cents, of every such twenty-five cents so paid, shall go to the treasurer of the state League to be used to defray expenses of state League officers, and the balance paid to the treasurer of the National Liberal League. The secretary of the National Liberal League shall return to each secretary of local League full value in publications. The purchasing of immense quantities will enable the National Liberal League to thus receive six to seven cents per month from each member in the United States, while the judicious distribution of so large an amount of the very best Liberal literature could not fail to constantly multiply members.

Local Leagues can be made self-sustaining by economically providing amusements—balls, parties, excursions, picnics, etc., while building up the League by increase of sociability.

After consultation and discussion, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the purpose of organization the states be districted, district organizers be appointed, and that said district officers be empowered to aid and encourage the formation of auxiliary Leagues, and that all such auxiliary Leagues be advised to meet quarterly in district convention.

Seconded by Charles Watts. On motion, carried unanimously. Mr. Palmer offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That appropriate leaflets based on the Nine Demands of Liberalism be prepared for distribution.

Seconded by S. P. Putnam. On motion, carried unanimously. On motion, the committee adjourned.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. Board of Directors N. L. L.
CHAS. WATTS, Ch'n.

From a most gratifying communication sent by Mr. John Ellis, of Texas, to Mr. S. P. Putnam, we extract the following: "The Liberal League has struck the key note of success in confining its efforts to an exposition of the Nine Demands, and to a determined opposition to theological impediments to the realizations of those Demands. This policy having been accepted by the whole of the officers of the League, our triumph is certain. We wish Messrs. Watts and Putnam all the success they deserve, which is much. It also speaks well for the future to see Mr. C. B. Reynolds in the field in an official capacity. He is a good and true man, one who knows what to do and how to do it."

Mr. George Hoffman writes: "Having watched the proceedings of the National Liberal League from its commencement, it affords me the greatest of pleasure to see the undoubted success attending the efforts of the new officers. That this success is real no one can question who observes the support now being given to the League from all parts of this vast continent. Let every Liberal who has the cause at heart render what assistance he or she can, and the present year will mark an important epoch in the history of American Liberalism. All the friends to whom I hav spoken upon the subject are delighted at the present bright prospects."

Next week Messrs. Watts and Putnam go to Canada to attend the great convention at Toronto. The progress of Freethought in the dominion of late has been truly marvelous, and the efforts of Mr Watts within the last few months to consolidate the Liberal elements in that country hav been followed with the most pleasing results. The intention to amalgamate the two associations—that of Canada and the states—is an excellent one, which we hope and believe will be productiv of mutual advantages. All Liberals throughout Canada should make a point of being present at Toronto on the 13th, 14th, and 15th of the present month.

Mr. Henry Wallis writes the secretary of the League a most encouraging letter from Washington, in which he says: "The worst enemy of the League cannot fail to be impressed with the harmony and oneness of purpose now existing throughout the entire Liberal League. The slight confusion which once marred our movement is being rapidly cleared away by the able and definit policy of the new directors. So far as we are enabled to judge here, there is but one desire, and that is that Messrs. Watts and Putnam shall be heartily seconded in their great and useful work."

J. D. MICHENER, Colmar, Penn.: I inclose $2 for the National Liberal League Fund. Please place one dollar to the credit of Jas. B. Edwards, of Lansdale, Pa.

JACOB NUESSLE, Hamburg, N. Y.: I send you two dollars for annual memberships in National Liberal League, one dollar for my brother John Nuessle and one for yours truly.

ELISHA AND MATILDA HYATT, Merrick, L. I.: We hav been been slow in helping on the Campaign Fund. It is better late than never, so here is five dollars to help giv humanity a chance to think.

MARY E. TILLOTSON, Vineland, N. J., writes kind words of cheer and givs name of officers of Vineland League, No. 61: President, Thomas Street; Secretary, Mary C. Tillotson; Treasurer, Lucy B. Street.

DR. L. B. FARRAR, Paxton, Ill.: Inclosed please find P. O. order for $5 for the general purposes of the National Liberal League. You may hear from me more at large through THE TRUTH SEEKER ere long. Yours for universal freedom of thought and action, and earnest effort to obtain release from all ecclesiastical dictation.

A. S. V. MANSFELDE, SECRETARY OF NEBRASKA STATE MEDICAL SOCIETY, ASHLAND, NEB.: I am sure that the position of the National Liberal League some years ago in regard to the postal law disagreed somewhat with the feelings of people generally of the West. Trifling matters like the one alluded to should not consume the time nor the money, and, above all, the brains, of Liberal-minded men. Indeed, we hav more important things to look after out here. I am, personally, for total separation of church and state, and also of schools from the former, and anything I can do in this direction you are at liberty to command.

The Religions of England.

If Christianity consists in going to church, and passing one's life in discussing theological questions, then John Bull is mightily Christian; if piety consists in quarreling over the dogmas, instead of practicing the principles of religion, then the piety of John is unequaled. The craze for religion has come to a mania. Let the religion be good or bad, no matter which it is, or what it is, it is better than none at all. In France, we boast of our foibles, even of many that are not to be found in us; in England, people boast of their virtues, especially those they do not possess. The Frenchman is the braggart of vice; the Englishman is the hypocrit of virtue.

Here, every religious belief is respected; the Shakers, the Ranters, the Peculiar People, the Salvationists; Freethinkers alone are excluded. When a man wants a situation, he presents himself to his future master as a Christian; he advertises in the papers as a total abstainer. If, in France, he recommends himself as a good Christian, he would receive a peremptory kick that would send him straight to Paradise.

Every Englishman worships God after his own fashion. There exist here one hundred and eighty-three religious sects certified to the Registrar General. Each of these sects has naturally found the truth. As, unfortunately, no one has ever yet come back from the other world to tell what he has seen, it seems probable that there are yet many days of peace and plenty in store for the dervishes, the fakirs, and others who liv in indolence upon the supersitition and simplicity of the world.

Christianity is admirable. Christians are often far from being so. I hav more esteem for the Mohammedans who follow up their religion. Show me the Christian that loves his neighbor as himself; who, when he has been struck on the right cheek, holds out his left; who forgivs his enemies; who does not ask for that which has been taken from him; who does unto others as he would hav others do unto him.

Religion has lost much of its purity and sincerity from ceasing to be private, especially in England, where, owing to competition, to free trade applied to religious matters, every one aims at appearing better than his neighbors. Pray, not standing in the synagogs, nor upon the house-tops, but enter into thy closet and shut the door, say the scriptures. How many do so?

The Romanists swear by the pope; the Protestants by Luther and Calvin; the Puritans by John Knox; the Wesleyans by John Wesley; the Salvationists by Mr., Mrs., and Miss Booth; the Baptists of London crowd to the Tabernacle to listen eagerly to every word that falls from Mr. Spurgeon's lips. Some people believe themselvs saved, if they only touch the coat-tails of Mr. Moody or Mr. Sankey. I hav seen women press the hands of these evangelists, as they passed on their way to the platform where they were going to preach, and go away happy. When Catholics hav the gout, it is to Our Lady of Lourdes, to Our Lady of la Salette, to la beinheureuse Germaine that they go; it is Sainte Barbe that they implore to protect them from thunder and lightning; the Deity would seem to play a secondary part in the religion of all these people.

In England, religion is the idea that absorbs and dominates all others. The prisons and madhouses are full of religious maniacs.

In France, when we hear of a great crime having been committed, we exclaim, "Where is the woman?" In England, sift the matter, and you will find a chapel. There are few bankrupts, really worthy of that name, that hav not built a church or chapel to win the confidence of investors, and, maybe, also to offer to God a little of that which they had taken from men. On opening my newspaper to-day, I read of an individual charged with fraudulent bankruptcy. A worthy old lady, who had trusted him with stock, states that she had every confidence in the accused, especially since the day when he refused a box at the opera, which she had offered him, with the remark that he was happy to be able to say that he had never set foot in such a place.

We all remember the sickening profession of religion that Guiteau, the vile and cowardly assassin of poor President Garfield, made day after day for months.

The United Kingdom possesses two state churches; the Anglican church, in England and Wales; the Presbyterian church, in Scotland. The State church was abolished in Ireland in 1869.

The Anglican church is under the jurisdiction of two archbishops—the Archbishop of Canterbury, primate of England, and the Archbishop of York—and of thirty bishops. The two archbishops and twenty-four bishops hav seats in the House of Lords.

The Scotch church is under the jurisdiction of a General Assembly, composed of clerical and lay deputies, and presided over by a Moderator elected annually by the Assembly, and a High Lord Commissioner appointed each year by the crown.

The principal Nonconformist churches are, the Methodists, the Baptists, the Unitarians, the Congregationalists or Independents, and the Wesleyans.

Out of a population of 81,000,000 souls in the United Kingdom and the colonies, 18,000,000 belong to the Anglican church; 14,500,000 are Methodists; 13,500,000 Catholics; 10,250,000 Presbyterian; 8,000,000 Baptists; 6,000,000 Congregationalists; 1,000,000 Unitarians; and about 10,000,000 belong to different sects of less importance.

I will giv a complete list of the hundred and eighty odd religious sects of England:

The Advent Christians;
The Apostolics;
The Arminians, who, contrary to the Calvinists, believe that Christ saved all men by his death;
The Baptists, who deny that baptism should be received before the Christian has arrived at years of discretion and made a profession of faith;
The Baptized Believers;
The Believers in Christ, or Christians who believe that their prayers alone can influence the decrees of Divine Providence;
The Believers in the Divine Visitation of Joanna Southcott, prophetess of Exeter;
The Benevolent Methodists;
The Bible Christians, or Bryanites, a sect founded in 1815, by William O'Bryan, and who receive the Communion seated;
The Bible Defense Association;
The Blue Ribbon Army, whose followers drink no alcoholic drink;
The Brethren, who practice no rites and hav no ministers; they baptize one another. According to them, to preach the gospel is to deny that the Savior's work is finished;
The Calvinists, who deny the real presence;
The Calvinistic Baptists, who find the opinions of Wesley too Arminian;
The Catholic Apostolic church;
The Christians, owning no name but the Lord Jesus;
The Christians, who object to be otherwise designated;
The Christian Believers;
The Christian Brethren;
The Christian Disciples;
The Christian Eliasites;
The Christian Israelites;
The Christian Mission;
The Christian Teetotalers;
The Christian Temperance Men;
The Christian Unionists;
The Christadelphians;
The Anglican church, itself divided into High Church, Low Church, and Broad Church. The adherents of the High Church, otherwise the Ritualists, adopt the confessional and grand ceremonies in imitation of the Roman Catholics. They do not recognize the authority of the pope, and can therefore receive the financial support of the state. The Low Church affects an almost Calvinistic austerity, and is very much akin to Dissent. The Broad Church party does not believe in hell, and counts amongst its clergy some of the most illustrious names of England. The late Dean Stanley was the brightest ornament of the Broad Church.
The Church of Scotland;
The Scotch Free Church;
The Church of Christ;
The Church of the People;
The Church of Progress;
The Congregationalists, who appoint their own ministers, and hav no settled form of prayer;
The Countess of Huntingdon's Connection, who adopt the Church of England prayer-book. This sect was founded in the eighteenth century by Lady Selina Shirley, Countess of Huntingdon;
The Covenanters, a sect founded in the sixteenth century, when the Protestant church was thought to be in danger;
The Coventry Mission Band;
The Danish Lutherans;
The Disciples in Christ;
The Disciples of Jesus Christ. Sect founded by Mr. Thomas Campbell, who proposed to set aside all questions of dogma, and to establish the unity of the church of the Savior;
The Eastern Orthodox Greek church;
The Eclectics;
The Episcopalian Dissenters;
The Evangelical Free church;
The Evangelical Mission;
The Evangelical Unionists, founded in Scotland in 1840, by Mr. James Morrison, who proclaimed the greatest sin to be a want of belief that Christ has, by his death, saved all men, past, present, or unborn;
The Followers of the Lord Jesus Christ;
The Free Catholic Christian church;
The Free Christians;
The Free Christian Association;
The Free church;
The Episcopal Free church;
The Free Church of England;
The Free Evangelical Christians;
The Free Grace Gospel Christians;
The Free Gospel and Christian Brethren;
The Free Gospel church;
The Free Gospelers;
The Free Methodists;
The Free Union church;
The General Baptists;
The General Baptist New Connection.
The German Evangelical Community;
The German Lutherans;
The German Roman Catholics;
The Glassites, a sect founded in Scotland, in the eighteenth century, by John Glass, into which members are admitted with a holy kiss. The followers of John Glass abstain from all animal food that has not been bled;
The Glory Band;
The Greek Catholic Church;
The Halifax Psychological Society;

Here ends the list of salvation agencies in England. If John Bull does not go straight to paradise, it will not be his fault, as you see.—Max O'Rell, in "John Bull and His Island."

The American Lesson of the Free Trade Struggle in England.

Gen. M. M. Trumbull, of the Radical Review, Chicago, has given us under this title an interesting chapter of the philosophy of history. I do not propose to review the work here, but to draw from it a certain vein of suggestions on

FILIATION OF PREJUDICES.

Our author shows how the insular position of Great Britain coincided with exclusivness and the sentiment of independence. "To this demagogs appealed on every hustings, glorifying the wisdom of a policy which aimed to make England independent of foreigners, especially in meat and flour." It supposes that what we import is an injury to our nation, or, at least, an advantage to the exporting nation, which ought not to be allowed, unless this nation agrees to receive from us equal values in perishable produce. Mr. Blackstone voiced the spirit of this queer notion when in congratulating Parliament on the resolution of the ministry to maintain the Corn laws he also "trusted that the threat of importing American grain through Canada would not again be heard of." This fear lest foreigners should get the advantage in exchanges was the more groundless from the fact that what Great Britain most wanted was, and is, raw material and produce of the soil, a sort of value more easily exhaustible than what she gives in exchange, viz., her labor and skill in the form of manufactures. Facts and reason, however, are feeble in face of inbred prejudices. "It was all that intellectual men in power, like Peel and Gladstone, could do to reconcile their party to the reduction of the tariff upon imports other than breadstuffs. All through this debate they were soothing and wheedling Parliamentary dunces with predictions that though they were reducing import duties on several hundred articles, yet there was not much danger that advantage would be taken of it, or that the country would be flooded with cheap goods.

"The Dukes of Wellington and Richmond, Lord Stanhope, and others foreboded great distress among the industrial classes with whom the foreigner was put unfairly in competition." There seems to be a hypochondriac element in this dread of competition.

Insular pride and exclusivness thus formed an entering wedge for the doctrine of depressiv abundance. Accepted by virtue of its association with the hateful foreigner, this prejudice stood ready to protest against the invasion of the steam engin, that grimy monster whose offspring was "over production, and which threw out of employment so many weavers, wagoners, horse-breeders," etc., etc. The same insolidarity which rendered the potential benefits of machinery an actual curse to so many, was betrayed by "the rejoicing of the country over a hailstorm which broke every exposed pane of glass in London, or a fire that destroyed a block of buildings, making work for the carpenters, bricklayers, and glaziers." The author does not seem to perceive that such one-sided views show not merely narrowness of mind, but, having solid basis in facts, can only be converted to a higher social reason by a higher social synthesis in co-operativ association. It is, indeed, of "no use to explain to the sufferers that what they call over-production is but the blessing of plenty, which, if not hindered by protectiv legislation, would soon diffuse itself throughout the land, sharing its benefits among all the people, acting and re-acting upon every member of the community." For to comprehend this requires more than a "mental effort" and more than the repeal of bad laws; it requires the new facts of a complete economic reconstruction in the relations of property and of the integral elements of society. Cobden, the League, and Gen. Trumbull are as much outside the social truth touching the meat of this matter as were Gladstone, Peel, and Russell.

Our author disposes too flippantly of machinery, viz.: "Of course there was a man in the House of Commons ready to lay the whole blame for everything on machinery. Mr. Baillie thought that the distress of the people was all owing to the invention of machinery, and that except for that, everybody would be prosperous and happy."

Mr. Baillie is not the only one-sided seer The perfected machinery of our day is the result of all past human evolution and of the combined efforts of several successiv generations of scientists, as well as of the sacrifice of millions of operativs. Viewed, then, in its origin and development as in its results, it is unjust and absurd that it should be sequestrated and monopolized to the profit of a small class of capitalists. By what sort of contract its tenure should be held, this is not the place to discuss, but upon the true solution of this question our social destiny depends.

A problematical figure among the champions of the old school, whose meaning lies, perhaps, somewhat deeper than the retrograde conservatism for which our author credits him, is that of Mr. Ferraud. Had he, or not, ulterior and constructiv purpose in his single-minded protest against the encroachments of machinery on the rights of Englishmen to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? About this, we hav no hint, as our author sees in him only the absurd. He may hav been a hypocrit playing a bluff game to distract from the consideration of the Corn laws in the interests of the landlords, or he may hav been intensely sincere, as a patriot, in opposing merely palliativ measures like free trade, which, by affording some temporary relief, would relegate to a more distant epoch the solution of that more vital problem, the co-ordination of machinery to the general welfare of society. The two ideas, one negativ, but immediately practical and unquestionably just, the removal of an arbitrary obstruction to the livelihood of labor, the other a shadowy innuendo, trembling in the presence of that monster power which may either redeem humanity from drudgery, or sink it into a hell lower than the bestial state. Mr. Ferraud's opposition is most conspicuous in his pretended amendment to Mr. Villier's annual motion, June, '44, to abolish the Corn laws, Mr. Ferraud substituting, to sustain them, while attributing the distress of the unemployed to machinery. On another occasion he moved to tax this so high as to keep the margin of its profits proportionate with that of those of the simple works which it had superseded. This was no solution, but could it be carried into effect, the manufacturers would not hav been slow to find the solution of the problem, How to get rich by being just. The golden rule may become more productiv than a gold mine. EDGEWORTH.

Refining the God Idea.

Gods are the creatures of human imagination. Civilized man fashions for himself a civilized God. Barbarous tribes invent blood-thirsty demons. We sometimes hear it said that people of all nations and all times hav believed in the existence of God. It can never be said that they hav agreed as to the nature of the being or beings on whom they bestowed the divine title.

We need go no further than to the pages of the Old Testament to prove this. We hav only to compare the Jehovah we find there with the deity of our own day to see that there has been evolution in heaven as well as on earth, and that gods hav more than kept pace with men in the refinements of civilization. The God now preached has undergone a refining process until all the evil has been eradicated from his nature. He is now infinit sweetness and light, the author only of good, and can no longer say of himself, "I form the light and create darkness. I make peace and create evil. I the Lord do all these things" (Isaiah xlv, 7).

The God proclaimed from our modern pulpits is a pure spirit, without body, parts, or passions, infinit in his power and his goodness. It is impossible to conceive any stronger contrast than this affords to the Jehovah of the Old Testament. This body was composed of parts, for we hear of his face, hands, and other members. He could walk and talk, and appears to hav suffered from the heat of the sun, as he preferred taking exercise in the cool of the day or in the night. Now he fills the universe; but then his creatures found that a small garden afforded space sufficient to hide from his presence. Since that time he has wonderfully developed in extension, but what he has gained in size he has lost in substance. He has been stretched out into space until he has become so thin as to be invisible. We can understand a blood-thirsty and powerful demon having made his residence among the Jews of old much more easily than we can suppose the presence of infinit goodness everywhere in a world where there is still space for so much that is evil.

But the most remarkable transformation of all is that God is now without passions. Oh! my Christian friends, if Moses and Joshua could be restored to life, with what powerful and not over-delicate language would they take you to task for worshiping strange gods! Divested of his passions, they could never recognize their old friend from Sinai. He might hav altered in personal appearance, he might hav changed in taste so as to find the odor of incense an agreeable substitute for that of hot blood from slaughtered cattle, once so delicious in his nostrils. But without his passions, the most intimate friends of his youth must fail to know him. They would declare that all the world had gone astray after opposition divinities, and would send fiery serpents and other unpleasant visitors into the streets of our most orthodox cities.

It is by his violent, ungovernable, and unreasonable passions that Jahveh can be distinguished from all other gods that ever had existence in the fertil imaginations of superstitious and credulous men. The cursing of all creation, animate and inanimate, for the fault of a man, a woman, and a serpent, is such an instance of silly indulgence in angry temper as cannot be matched in history or fable. His repenting and grieving at his heart for having made man, his resolving to destroy him with all the rest of his works, and yet preserving sufficient of each kind to perpetuate the race, is pueril weakness. His entire history, as given in the Old Testament, is but a record of acts springing from passions, and in the great majority of cases from passions of an evil nature. When he condescends to giv us some information about himself, it is of a piece with the rest. He speaks of one of the meanest and most contemptible of passions leading him to commit the vilest injustice: "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children" (Exodus xx, 5). Wonderful indeed is the change from this God to the passionless spirit Christians profess to adore.

In the New Testament, although we may easily perceive a marked improvement in his character, we by no means find a God without passions. John expressly states that "God is love," and surely love is a passion. In truth he seems to hav undergone every possible change of disposition. As the deity of a barbarous nation of Jews, he was much given to threatening and executing vengeance when his temper was ruffled, which appears to hav been of tolerably frequent occurrence. On these occasions he showed no discrimination, for the innocent and the guilty generally shared the effects of his anger equally between them. He was deceitful, treacherous, and the especial patron of roguery and vice. When his worshipers had been refined a little by contact with more civilized peoples, he became a merciful and forgiving divinity, loving instead of hating, and ready to pardon sinners at the eleventh hour in the place of chastising them with reckless fury. He was changed from an evil demon to a good god. Still he had passions and strong ones, but now we are informed he has none. However, if we may credit those who profess to know most about him, he acts precisely as human beings act under the influence of certain passions. He loves all men, but those who flatter him most get the largest share of his affection. He showered blessings upon all the earth, but they fall thickest among the most persistent and most abject beggars. He has improved in proportion as man who made him has improved, and when he has undergone a little more of the refining process it will be discovered that he has been refined entirely away.

Hidden Treasure.

There is a treasure within the rearch of man that is more precious than gold, and is inexhaustible. It also does the work of hundreds of labor-saving machines. That treasure is credit. Abused as it is, and ever has been, or neglected, it is worthless. Organized and used aright, it is as above described. It has never yet been employed properly. Ignorance of its potency on the part of poor laboring men leaves them in the power of the rich. Did men know but it, all the wealth of the future is in the hands of labor. Properly organized labor is independent of so-called capital. Here is the little secret which, if truly understood, will revolutionize the world: A owes B. Now, B will take anything in payment provided his creditors will take it from him. B owes C. Will C take it? Yes, because he owes it to A. The grand object is to find this C, who is owed by B, and who owes A (who is a creditor of one and debtor to the other.) At all times the people owe their government all the revenues, while the government is continually in debt to its army, navy, its contractors, and civil officers. Therefore at all times the government can circulate the public credit, receiving the bills back again. And no one but the government ought to enjoy the benefit of this. When not used by the government, it is given to a few individuals as a monopoly. Moreover, did men but realize it, they hav the use of this credit in their own hands, if they choose. In the mines and in the fields are thousands of men who depend on capital, as they call it, to develop their mines and farms; that is, they depend on some one else's credit. They must borrow silver or gold to develop the gold under their feet, or the credit that is given to its supposed possession. Yet a proper organization and use of their own power should do it for them. Cheaper modes of transportation will render the use of this power more efficient because more profitable to the producers. Organization, confidence, harmony, and industry are all that are required to put this mighty treasure to use. HOLT.

Our New Story Book.

It is scarcely necessary to call attention to the advertisment of our new story book for children and youth, by the talented editress of our Children's Corner—it shows for itself. But we must ask our friends to send in their orders for it promptly, to the end that we may get back some of the large outlay necessary to its publication.

It is the first attempt in this country—and, we think, in any—to publish a book for Freethinkers' children equal in finish and illustration and general attractivness to the thousands printed in the interests of superstition. Books there are, and excellent ones so far as reading matter goes, but this will be profusely illustrated, printed on tinted paper, with illuminated covers, and just such a book as we know from experience will attract the little ones and the youth of ten to sixteen. The lessons the stories inculcate are those of honesty, truthfulness, kindness, and charity—natural morality, on scientific principles. The illustrations are selected for their beauty and interest, and will, we feel sure, prove of unfailing interest to the youthful readers of the book.

We hope THE TRUTH SEEKER's endeavor to fill a long-felt want will be generously appreciated by the friends of education, and that the orders will flow in early and often.

Figures That Lie.

The Plenary Council has inspired some writer to giv to the public the following estimate of the comparativ and total number of denominationalists in this country. As it is going the rounds of the press, and will be used by religious papers, it is worth while to analyze it:

"The presence in Baltimore in attendance at the Plenary Council of the Catholic prelates and dignitaries and the interchange of opinions resulting from their several meetings hav served to direct particular attention to a table which has just made its appearance. It has been customary heretofore to gage the growth of religious organizations in this country by comparativ figures at each new reckoning. But as the whole population is always increasing rapidly, the various denominations hav thus always been able to show a healthy gain in numbers. Since the opening of the council an attempt has been made by careful students and statisticians to show these results relativly for the better guidance of the prelates. The table which has been prepared arrives at some conclusions little less than startling.

"By the census of 1860 the population of the United States was 31,445,080. The present population is now estimated at 55,000,000. The gain in twenty-five years has been, therefore, twenty-three and a half millions, or at the rate of 75 per cent.

"In 1860, according to estimates the accuracy of which was then universally acknowledged, there were 8,600,000 Methodists in this country. They were then, as they are now, the strongest religious body, numerically. Since 1860 the total has grown to 15,000,000, which is an increase of 75 per cent, keeping pace exactly with the increase in population.

"The number of affiliants of the various Baptist churches was, in 1860, 8,000,000. To-day it is 12,000,000. The increase in twenty-five years is, therefore, 50 per cent, a gain in absolute ratio, but a falling off when considered relativly.

"The Presbyterians numbered in 1860 3,600,000. Now they number 5,500,000, an increase in twenty-five years of 53 per cent.

"The Lutherans, who hav been materially benefited by constant and increasing emigration from Germany, Sweden, Holland, and Norway, hav grown from 1,250,000 in 1860, to 2,000,000 in 1884, or at the rate of 60 per cent.

"The Congregationalists hav declined relativly very much. The old spirit of the New England pilgrims seems to be dying out among them. In twenty-five years they hav advanced but 27 per cent—that is, from 1,413,000 in 1860 to 1,800,000 at present.

"The Episcopalians show a fair increase in numbers, yet one relativly below the average. Their percentage of gain is 33 1-2 per cent in twenty-five years, bringing up the total from 900,000 to 1,200,000.

"The Hebrews—counting together those who are orthodox, and those who are merely nominal—hav increased from 350,000 in 1860 to 700,000 in 1884, a full 100 per cent of gain.

"The Friends of Quakers, show an absolute as well as relativ decline. They hav fallen off 60 per cent, from 220,000 in 1860 to 150,000 in 1884.

"The denomination of Christians, who are numerous in Kentucky, southern Indiana, southern Illinois, and Missouri, number 800,000 against 500,000 in 1860, an absolute gain of 60 per cent, yet a falling off relativly of 15.

"But the most surprising feature of the calculations just completed is the growth of the Catholics. In 1860 they numbered in the United States 3,175,000. Now they are 9,500,000 This is a gain of 200 per cent, in twenty-five years. Should the same ratio of increase continue to be preserved, they would number fifteen years hence 25,000,000.

"The difficulties encountered in arriving at even an approximate result in religious statistics are many. In the United States, as in England and Scotland, the doctrinal views of individuals form no item in the census enumeration. The generally accepted plan for arriving at a result is as follows: The church accommodations, which are gathered officially, are multiplied by a figure representing in that denomination the relation of churchgoers to the whole number of its adherents. Then another table is made of the number of enrolled members or communicants. These are multiplied usually by five for the full population. Finally, a third table is constructed from the church records of baptisms and marriages, and the official record of deaths. These tables are compared in parallel columns, and an estimate is make from the three. The substantial accuracy, not alone of these tables, but of the net results deduced from their comparison, is not questioned, though, of course, the circumstances of their compilation do not preclude the possibility of occasional errors.

"It is the opinion of many of the Catholic clergy assembled here that in default of American universities of very high scholarship, Catholic preachers hav to contend in their missionary labors with a difficulty not met with in Europe. This subject is one certain not to be neglected by the Plenary Council. Bishop Gross, of Savannah, has sought to interest his colleagues in a plan for more efficient pastoral efforts among the colored population of the Southern states, wherein (outside of Louisiana and Texas) the Catholic church has at present, confessedly, very little foothold. It is to be noted that the churches of all creeds and denominations in the United States contain accommodations for 27,500,000 persons, or just half of the whole population of 55,000,000."

Let us compare these figures with such official figures as it is possible to obtain. It is not necessary to go back to 1860. Those published this year and bringing the census down to the close of 1883 will do very well. In the first place we will quote from the Methodist Centennial Year Book published last January by Phillips and Hunt, official publishers for the Methodist church, and edited by W. H. De Puy, D.D., who stands at the head of official Methodist encyclopedists and statisticians.

Our writer from Baltimore places the numerical strength of the Methodists, in round numbers, at 15,000,000. The official Year-Book puts the number of all Methodists in the United States at—what? fifteen millions?—not a mite of it. There are just 3,993,724 Methodists in the country according to their own showing, and it will scarcely be asserted that Methodists are modest in claiming membership in this world or the next.

The Baptists are given as numbering 12,000,000. Now, taking their own estimates, which include all Baptist congregations, without respect of ecclesiastical or denominational affiliations, up to 1883, and their membership is only 2,552,129.

Presbyterians are put down by this new statistician at five million and a half. The official figures are 1,002,944.

The Lutherans are credited with a membership of 2,000,000. The official figures are 800,189.

Congregationalists are flattered by being told they number 1,800,000. Their pride may hav a fall when they find that 387,619 is their total strength in this country.

Episcopalianism shrinks even more than Congregationalism. Instead of having 1,200,000, as this writer asserts, the official figures are 313,889.

The number of Hebrews is even more grossly exaggerated. The gentleman inspired by the plenary council claims for them 700,000. Congressional Librarian Spofford, in the American Almanac for 1883, puts the number of Jews in the country attending synagogs regularly at 13,683—a very material difference.

That the Friends are declining in numerical strength is very true. A large proportion of those who forsake their ranks, however, do not enter the fold of any other denomination of Christians. They usually become Freethinkers. Mr. Spofford puts their strength in 1883 at 67,643, between which and 150,000 there is a wide margin for "clerical errors."

The "Christians," or "Disciples of Christ," number, according to Mr. Spofford, 567,448; while, according to the church statistics, their numbers are a few thousand less—namely, 563,928. Quite a difference between these figures and 800,000.

Nine and a half millions is too much to allow the Catholics to-day, though there is no question that they hav increased much faster than the other sect. Sadlier's Catholic Directory for 1882 put the number at 6,370,858; at the same time, however, leading and well-posted Catholics claimed, in round numbers, seven millions. Probably the total strength now is about the latter figure, or slightly over it. This includes, however, the entire Catholic population, and a slight drawback must be made on that account. We must acknowledge that the Catholic church holds its membership well in hand, and the shrinkage from heresy is comparativly slight.

A summary of the claimed and official figures shows a monstrous difference. The quoted article makes a Christian membership of 48,500,000. The official church figures of the same denominations only foot up to 16,066,606. This is out-Heroding Herod with a vengeance.

But if the figures are so faulty, what must be said of the manner of gathering them! The first method is to multiply the seating capacity of the churches by "some figure" which somebody thinks is the right one to denote the comparativ number of church goers and church adherents! Now, every one knows that the right way would be to subtract from the seating capacity of the churches the difference between the number of seats and the average number who attend, for with the exception of a few churches, whose pulpits are occupied by sensational or heretical preachers, the seating capacity of the joss-houses is fully double the average attendance. Subtraction, and not multiplication, is the arithmetical process to be applied in the first methods of computation.

In the second method, the multiplier is altogether too large. Taking the total number of communicants is probably the fairest way of arriving at denominational strength. But to multiply that by five is monstrously absurd in the face of the well-known prevailing tendency to irreligion. The communicant of the family is usually the mother or daughter, and it is rare for her to hav the full support of more than one other member of the family. Indeed, it is a matter of extreme doubt whether the number of communicants (bearing in mind the number carried on Protestant church rolls who hav "moved away," and the custom of the Catholics of carrying as church-members all baptized—even in infancy—by their priests), will not cover the full denominational strength of the sects. There are, of course, many so-called Christians who do not attend the churches—no doubt of that. But their Christianity is of that lukewarm and shadowy kind that attaches itself to no denomination. Their mothers and perhaps their fathers were Christians, and they suppose they must be; but the matter occupies scarcely a moment of their thought, and when they shall begin to seriously reflect upon the question of religion the chances are at least eight to seven that they will become followers of science instead of blind devotees of superstition. The unchurched multitude in this country is at least as two to one.

The third method of computation mentioned is so plainly open to errors that scarcely a line need be written upon it. The idea that every infant baptized grows up a Christian, that every couple married by a minister are members of his church, or that every corpse over which a priest may pray was in life the devoted friend of the Christian faith, is grossly foolish. It is a thought of which an ill-concealed wish was the father.

But suppose the test of creed is taken instead of church attendance, or even of communicants, what would be the result then? One hardly flattering to the churches, we are sure. There is scarcely a church in the cities of the country, outside of Catholic bodies, in which all the members are orthodox. Beecher's church, for instance, is counted for Christ. Yet the pastor is an acknowledged Infidel, and his immense congregation is nearly all with him. Heber Newton, an Episcopalian, is another case in point. His brother Episcopalian preachers tried at one time to hav him expelled for heresy, and would hav succeeded had not the bishop and his advisers feared that with Mr. Newton would hav gone not only the congregation of the Anthon Memorial church, but many, if not a majority, of the Episcopalians of the city. Indeed, it is shrewdly surmised that the Bishops Potter themselvs had a good deal of sympathy with the views of Mr. Newton.

Perhaps one-half of the nominal Christians of the country accept the theory of evolution. To put it broadly, and yet accurately, no one can be a Christian who is an evolutionist. It is utterly impossible to reconcile with Genesis the law of natural selection, of the survival of the fittest, and of the gradual ascent of man from the animal kingdom. Yet upon Adam's creation, and subsequent fall in the manner specified, depends the whole scheme of vicarious atonement, which is the very essence of Christianity. Theologians may quibble and twist and squirm as much as they like, but they can never get around this. If Eden is a myth, Calvary was useless, and the sacrifice of the "god" upon its cross of no more avail in the remission of sins than the lives of the two thieves said to hav been crucified with him. We believe in consistency. Truth is an agreement of statement with fact. There is hardly a statement or position of Christianity—no essential one—that agrees with ascertained and demonstrated facts. And while the great body of the people of this country acknowledge and accept the demonstrated facts, a portion of them still delude themselvs with the fancy that they are Christians. Popular Protestant Christianity is getting to be a very vague and shadowy system of theology. People are allowing themselvs to be called Christians when they are no more real Christians than is a Hottentot. They do not believe in the fundamental assertions of the system, nor in the formulated creeds. They are simply moving along with the drift of the times, and that drift is very well known and acknowledged to be widely divergent from the narrow current setting toward the church. No comparativ estimate of the strength and weakness of denominational Christianity in this country can be within a million miles of accurate which does not take these facts into consideration.

The growth of Catholicism, however, while greatly exaggerated, is certainly tremendous, and calls for the most energetic action on the part of all true patriots. Church and state must be completely separated before another quarter of a century rolls away, or we fear it can never be done without bloodshed.

The Workingman in Politics.

The Sun and John Swinton's Paper both worked for the workingman's candidate for president—the latter earnestly and sincerely, the former solely to defeat Mr. Cleveland. After the election Mr. Swinton voiced his disappointment at the small results apparent as follows:

"Nearly all the workingmen of the country voted against the platform which contained almost every demand made in their behalf—the Indianapolis platform.

"Nearly all the Knights of Labor voted against the platform which embodied almost every article in their 'Declaration of Principles.'

"Nearly every trade unionist voted against the party which favored the legalization of national trade unions.

"A large proportion of the Greenbackers, who voted for Weaver four years ago, failed to vote for the Greenback candidate this month.

"Hosts of professed anti-monopolists voted for the two parties of monopoly and the money power.

"Not a few 'labor leaders' and 'labor papers' took sides against the party which sustained the principles they advocate.

"Many men who hav been threatening to 'fight for their rights' refused to cast a ballot for them, and voted for their enemies.

"The Indianapolis platform called for a reduction of the hours of labor; but where were the 'short-hour' men on election day? It called for the abolition of child labor; but where were the abolitionists?

"We are told that many of the Socialists of this city voted for Blaine or Cleveland.

"Many of the men who groan as they 'grind the mills of the Philistines' voted for the bosses of the mills.

"It is a queer world, after all; but let us keep on ploughing its rocky soil as long as life lasts."

This led the Sun last Sunday to recount its experience. "We hav witnessed," Mr. Dana observes, "a great many efforts to build up a third party, with the workingmen and their peculiar interests as the foundation, and we hav had hopes of some of them, and especially of the People's party in the late election, but these hopes hav not been fulfilled."

The reasons therefor the editor of the Sun finds in this:

"It appears that the political passions which govern the great parties are stronger than the impulses of special interests. The majority of the workingmen will not separate themselvs into a political organization which divides them from the great mass of the people. After all, they are Democrats or Republicans more than they are labor reformers, anti-monopolists, or Socialists, and when election day comes they go and vote with that political party which has the greater hold upon their sympathies. Yet Mr. Swinton and the other leaders of the radical ideas that look so far in advance of either Democratic or Republican theories, are amply justified in their devotion to the cause they hav embraced:

'Tis better to hav loved and lost
Than never to hav loved at all.'"

Years ago, when Mr. Swinton was one of Mr. Dana's editors, we were secretary of a labor organization. The organization failed for just the reasons given by Mr. Swinton. On election day the laboring men deserted the organization and its principles, abandoned its honest leaders, and voted for the candidates of the two old parties. About the first communication we ever penned for this paper were bitter words of reproach toward the workingmen inspired by this failure and a close acquaintance with their habits and general conduct in this city. Earnest John Swinton has met the same disappointment that equally earnest leaders did eight and nine years ago. The laborers of this city are not educated up to the point of caring for their own interests. They fight so savagely among themselvs that they become easy prey to experienced politicians. Yet we hope Mr. Swinton will keep on swinging his battle ax of reform. It is a powerful weapon and must inevitably do some execution. Let his courage and patience not fail and he will finally triumph. Let him take the Sun's flippant couplet seriously to heart.

The Vicious Circle.

The Independent opens its Thanksgiving editorial with the following profound remark:

"It is a striking proof of a supernatural supervision of human affairs that there is no period in any life, however dark and dismal, in which there are not many reasons for joy."

Perhaps that is true, but let us reverse the statement and say:

"It is a striking proof, etc., that there is no period in any life, however bright and cheerful, in which there are not many reasons for sadness."

Is this not also true? and if so, what does it prove as to "supernatural supervision?"

Editorial Notes.

A RELIGIOUS editor sojourned this summer in Europe. On his return a correspondent writes him to "Go on; travel round the world." The editor regards this as a very equivocal compliment.

IN a limited monarchy like England and Belgium, when a member is called to a cabinet position, he must again go before his constituents for re-election. Rarely indeed does a constituency fail to ratify the choice, but in the case of a Catholic member of King Leopold's ministry just appointed, the member only won by seventeen votes. Public opinion in Belgium at the present time is far from Christian.

IN considering the reasons why Mr. Cleveland's election can do no harm, granting that the gentleman himself is that way disposed, the Holt County Press says that if the devil himself was elected he would be powerless. Our blasphemous Southern friend (the devil is one of the Christian pantheon, and joking about the gods is blasphemy) forgets evidently that the devil is a more powerful individual than God (or Christian history is at fault), and certainly he would not allow that Jehovah could do no harm. Or does the Holt County Press believe in the superiority of the American people to all gods, devilish or Jehovistic?

THE Positivists, we learn, hav just had a grand meeting at Manchester, England. Mr. Frederic Harrison, of course, was "chief among equals." He had large opportunity to make himself heard and understood, and he spoke out fearlessly and with much force. What was wanted, he held, was "a practical scheme of society and politics leading to a new future for the commonwealth of nations." Christianity had lost its power. It was a Sunday religion, a mere praying and preaching concern. The Christian priest had nothing to do with ninety-nine out of every one hundred of his congregation. According to Mr. Harrison, the testing question for every system is: "What hav you done and what do you expect to do with this burden of modern poverty, this suffering hopelessness, this degradation of the vast laboring masses?"

TALMAGE has got within him the same Christian spirit that moved the witch-burners of Scotland, and the witch-beaters and hangers of Boston. Writing upon Spiritualism in Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine, after recounting some of the Spiritualistic phenomena, he asks and answers: "You want to know what God thinks of all these things. He says in one place, 'I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers.' He says in another place, 'Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv;' and lest you should make too wide a margin between Spiritualism and witchcraft, he groups them together and says, 'There shall not be found among you a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer, for all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord;' and then the still more remarkable passage which says, 'The soul that turneth after such as hav familiar spirits and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people;' and a score of passages showing that God never speaks of these evils in any other way than with livid thunders of indignation. After all that, be a Spiritualist if you dare." Well, we fancy a good many in this country will dare to be Spiritualists, or any other ists they please; but we commend this fulmination of the Brooklyn divine to those terming themselvs orthodox Spiritualists, who believe in the Christian God, in Christ as the biggest and best medium, and in the Bible as a revelation.

THE Christian Advocate complains of the inconsistency of those Methodists who shout themselvs hoarse over political candidates, but whose voices are not heard in the gatherings of the church; of those who are too "sick" to attend prayer-meetings, but who experienced no harm from night parades; of those who had plenty or money for campaign purposes, but not a cent when the church collector made his visits; and of those whose persuasiv powers were exercised on their friends for the benefit of their favorit candidate, but are lukewarm in drumming up recruits for Jesus. Didn't it occur to the Advocate that this complaint reveals a shocking state of affairs in its church?

EXERCISING the "horse sense" for which they are somewhat noted, the Jews reject the claims of Jesus to be the Messiah, but some among them think such a personage will yet appear. This has come out in the celebration of Sir Moses Montefiore's hundredth birthday. "Dr. Lehnman, chief rabbi of Mayence, in congratulating Sir Moses Montefiore upon his hundredth birthday anniversary, noticed the fact that in the Hebrew lesson for that week it was mentioned that the eminent men of old attained extraordinary age; also that in the Cabala, the authorship of which is ascribed to Rabbi Simeon Ben Jochal, 150 B.C., it is predicted that a similar phenomenon will occur as the harbinger of the Messiah."

IN Guilford, N. Y., a son proposed to go gunning on Sunday with his brother. His mother dissuaded him, saying, "I am sure something dreadful will happen if you use a gun on Sunday." He laughed, and, not supposing the gun loaded, pointed it at his brother and snapped it. The bullet went through his brother's head, and he fell a corpse. Now the survivor has become insane and the mother is prostrated with grief. This is regarded by the religious press as a direct result of the disregard of the Sabbath. "It might hav happened any day, but could not hav happened that day if he had kept the Sabbath or taken his mother's advice." But is it not plain to the ministerial editors that the fault was entirely with the Sabbath-keeping mother? If she had not stopped the boys as they were setting out on their hunting expedition they would not hav fooled with the gun, but gone on without mishap. Behold "on what a slender thread hang everlasting things!"

MRS. BESANT'S opinion of Mr. Gladstone's semi-backdown on the Franchise bill is that it "will hav saddened the hearts of every true Radical. A prime minister with a splendid majority; a popular leader, trusted by thousands who had flocked round him at his summons; a chief of a great party, who believed that his bold words meant bold action; he has betrayed the people who answered to his call, has flung away all the generous support he asked for, has yielded to petty court influence when he stood as the trusted leader of a nation. The Tories are jubilant; Lord Salisbury is triumphant; the House of Lords has succeeded in gaining its way, and the Commons bow meekly in acceptance of the scornful defiance of the hereditary law-makers of the land. Will the nation do the same? Will the crowds who have shouted 'Down with the lords!' mildly yield to lordly dictation? Gladstone has failed us; he has yielded to Lord Salisbury; he has preferred a royal smile to the nation's love; at a momentous crisis he has turned the scale in favor of lordly privilege against popular right. But does Gladstone's failure mean the people's defeat? Is there no radical in the ministry who will step forth and repudiate this betrayal? If there be none in the ministry who dare speak, there are some outside who will."

THE question of compulsory attendance at morning prayers is being agitated at Harvard College. A petition to the board of overseers has been drafted, asking that attendance at prayers be made voluntary for those students who are twenty-one years of age and upward, and optional according to the wishes of the parents or guardians of those who are under twenty-one years of age. When the petition was first issued, it contained a preamble which bound the signers, if the usual petition failed, "to follow it up with decisiv, concerted action," and a pledge "when alumni of this college to use all our influence to destroy this pernicious system and to cast our votes for overseers accordingly." The petition has received many signatures. This agitation has been going on spasmodically for several years, but the puritanical, tyrannous element has thus far prevailed with the overseers. To a question as to what the students think of the obligatory morning exercises, one of them said recently, "Oh, they think that it's a good way to get the fellows up in the morning—a sort of roll call, you know. They are not apt to be in a devotional frame of mind, though, and of course the thing is a farce from a religious point of view." An opinion on the same subject was obtained from a member of the St. Paul's Society: "I don't think," he said, "that either of the two religious societies—the St. Paul's or the Christian Brethren—will oppose the petition as a body. In fact, although I regret to say it, the attendance at the meetings of my society is lamentably small. Out of a membership of seventy-five sometimes but five or six attend the society's religious services." To another interrogatory as to how the students regarded morning prayers, he answered, "As an exercise to be got rid of, if possible." "What do you think," was further asked him, "the effect would be upon the attendance at prayers if they were made a voluntary instead of a compulsory exercise?" "I don't believe fifteen men would go to them. Some fellows go now willingly because the habit has grown upon them, and it is a convenient way to start the day, but they might just as well go over at the hour for prayers to the Delta and walk with uncovered heads around the statue of John Harvard." From all of which it is inferred that prayer is not held in high esteem by the students at Harvard.

Letters from Friends.

AN OPEN LETTER TO ELMINA.

ADAIR CREEK, E. TENN.

FRIEND ELMINA: I hav followed with interest your account of your pilgrimage in search of truth, and now I want to tell you a little of what I think of your last investigation in Syracuse.

But I must first say that I am not a Spiritualist. I hav never seen any spiritual manifestations, and hav no time, if I had the desire, to make personal investigations; but I hav long thought that there is an unknown force, which is related to electricity and magnetism, which is the motiv power of all these inexplicable actions.

It seems to me that in your experience at Syracuse the man to be watched was not Dr. Jasebrow, but Mr. Truesdell himself. This gentleman (Mr. Truesdell) told you that all those tricks were pure legerdemain, but he refused to giv the solution because other would-be mediums would learn the tricks and be enabled to deceive the unwary, and because it would forestall a second edition of his book.

Now, any man who is earnestly a truth seeker never loses a chance to disseminate the truth. To explain the fraud would not help would-be mediums, but, on the contrary, would destroy the business of the existing mediums, and instead of forestalling his coming book, a short but lucid explanation of the means used for deception given by him to you, and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, would hav been the very best advertisment he could possibly hav, and hav made earnest inquirers anxious for the coming of a book that would clear the mystery. I do not say that Mr. Truesdell is an impostor, but I do say that if any man should talk so to me, I would compel him to make his assertions good, or I would look upon him as an impostor and unworthy of confidence.

If Mr. Truesdell's words make me suspicious of him, his actions are no more calculated to inspire confidence. Let us look at what took place at the several seances. In the first, a slate, brought by you and held by Mr. Truesdell, has written on it, in answer to your request, "It is true; I am here. D. M. Bennett." No explanation is given of how the writing has been done. In the next test, on slates brought by Mr. Truesdell, are found two messages, one to Mr. Waldo, from his father, and another, in a female hand, to you. This Mr. Truesdell explains by showing that the slates are double, and stating that the messages hav been written beforehand by him and by his niece.

Now, this question arises in my mind: If Mr. Truesdell can, by a trick of legerdemain, write on an inclosed slate, why should he hav written at home, in advance of any knowledge of what question might be asked, a message; and if he cannot do it, then how did the writing come in your slate? Then certainly the writing was not done on double slates. And, furthermore, how did he answer the questions asked by Mrs. Bonta and yourself, written on a piece of paper and so folded that he could not see them?

To me it looks as if Mr. Truesdell possesses the power called mediumship—can answer unknown questions and write upon slates, but that he finds he can make more money by the course he is now pursuing. By using a slate with false surface, and showing it after the writing is done, he succeeds in making it appear to be a legerdemain trick. If it is really a trick, and he can perform it, nothing would hav been easier for him than to repeat it above the table and in full sight, so that you could hav come back perfectly satisfied that no occult power had any connection with it.

Next we hav an account of a seance where, after a circle has been formed, and hands joined, lights are seen and pats on the head and back received. This Mr. Truesdell explains by saying that he held your hand with two fingers, and Mr. Waldo's with the rest of the same hand, and used the other to perform the trick. Now, either Mr. Waldo was a confederate or not. If he was, what was the use to hold his hand? By breaking the circle, Mr. Waldo and Mr. Truesdell would each hav one hand free, and could hav performed to better advantage. If he was not a confederate, I must acknowledge I can not understand how the transfer could be made without you and Mr. Waldo being aware of it, nor can I understand any better how Mr. Truesdell could go through the muscular exercise necessary to light matches, throw them about, pat you on the head, back, etc., and you hold his hand and not know it, for it seems impossible to me that a man could go through such gymnastics and his body and one of his hands remain so completely passiv as they must hav been to deceive your senses.

The other tricks, box, bag, and half dollar, are probably common tricks of ledgermain, and those Mr. Truesdell could explain easily enough, but I certainly could not accept his other explanations without a much more careful scrutiny than you hav made. I should hav made him re-write the messages in my presence to see if he could duplicate the handwriting. I should hav made him repeat also above the table and in full sight the feat of writing between the slates, and I should hav made him reduplicate the performance of the circle in broad daylight.

It is, of course, possible that Mr. Truesdell can make his assertions good, but it seems to me that he has fallen very short from it, and just as I am unwilling to accept the Spiritualists' explanation of spiritual agency, no more can I accept Mr. Truesdell's explanation of deliberate fraud.

I hope you hav enjoyed your trip, but as to any conclusiv result, it will certainly hav none. If investigations of the sort you hav made could hav settled those questions, they would hav been at rest long ago. Neither Mr. Chainey, nor Mr. Savage, nor your own opinions will hav any weight with persons who do their own thinking. An actual increase of knowledge will alone enable us to settle that question, and that will only come from long and patient investigations by persons who will devote a large part of their time to intelligent researches. Probably we shall hav to wait till further advance will hav been made in other sciences, such as relate to electricity or magnetism, that will throw side lights that will make clear points that are now in profound obscurity, and at some future day some man of observation and trained intellect will find the explanation of those phenomena that now we cannot understand. In the mean time, I am willing to wait and let others investigate, and turn my attention to knowledge of more practical value, for I find enough of such to engage all my time, and they giv me much more satisfactory results.

ALBERT CHAVANNES.

TORONTO, ONT., Nov. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read much in Freethought publications about the tearing down of churches, or turning them into schools or theaters. I think there is room for the churches. Destroy the errors and enlighten the ignorant and superstitious worshipers of—they know not what; but inasmuch as they teach righteousness, they are good. The preachers are by no means the leaders of the people, but merely the reflectors in which may be seen the intelligence of the people. Were they not so they would be unpopular, and would soon get their ticket of leave.

If there is as much improvement in the church in the next twenty years as there has been in the past, a goodly share of the Bible will be outlawed.

The Salvation Army, with its tactics, is a fair illustration of the manner in which people were born again twenty years ago. The revivalist would giv out that next Sunday evening at early candle-light, God willing, he would begin a protracted effort for the salvation of souls. The appointed time arrives and the preacher draws it mild for a night or two, preaching Christ and him crucified and the immense love he had for the world; but finding no lost mutton coming into the fold on the sympathy lay, he rings in the terrors of the old man—not the devil altogether, but God, "who out of Christ is a consuming fire"—a congenial spirit for his Satanic majesty. They could never start the name until the air was thick with the fumes of brimstone. "Brother Snooks will lead in prayer." He begins quite rationally, but soon gets warmed to his work. Joined in unison, his breathing and sentences are short and spasmodic, and with the weighty and soul-stirring prayer comes forth a wheezy sound like unto the leaky sucker of an old-fashioned pump: "O Lord, bring these benighted sinners to repentance; shake 'em over hell, but don't let 'em fall in." All this with a running accompaniment of groans and amens from the chief priests and elders. Then some sister starts in a high key: "You can't stand the fire in that great day."

Such are the doings of the past. They are out of fashion. The preachers must be taught to preach sixteen ounces to the pound and square dealing generally, and let Jonah and Samson and all the gospel sharks and foxes go for what they are worth, saying these are fables, but may amuse the children. But by all means start fair with the children; tell them that these miraculous stories hav no foundation in truth, and hold up to derision all who hav done evil, be he child of God or goblin damned. The trouble is, the Bible is like the Claude Duval series of novels; readers get in sympathy with the criminals, and right here is the injury done.

Christ said to his preachers of old, "Take no heed of the morrow, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor wherewithal ye shall be clothed." But if a preacher has a call now from a church the first consideration is, What is the salary—how much a year? So they are not so anxious for the cause of their Lord Jesus as for the almighty dollar. Then let them go their way, and the time is not far distant when the edifices erected to an unknown God whom they ignorantly worship will be temples of liberty and Freethought.

JOHN HAIGHT.

BURNSIDE, PA., Nov. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Do thou forgiv all past sins of omission against thy book, and vouchsafe to thy patron the reading of the gospel of Freethought as far in the succeeding year as the inclosed "V" will pay for, and by that time the patron hopes to be able to raise another "V" to help spread the light of knowledge of the facts of our times. Yesterday I completed my sixtieth year. I hav some energy left yet to expend in the demolition of error. I was brought up a Scotch Presbyterian—hav been about thirty-five years free from the trammels of the church. I congratulate myself I hav done something for Freethought, and trust I will ever be found clad in the armor of justice, to do battle for the downtrodden, ignorant, priest-ridden multitude of our land. There are many topics discussed in your paper of great interest to an enlightened mind, but there are very few who will venture to subscribe for it for fear of Mrs. Grundy or the loss of shekels.

ALEX. MCCULLOUGH.

NEW YORK, Nov. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As the old year is drawing to a close, we, as Liberals and Freethinkers, I trust in the future will look back with great satisfaction as we advance in the noble work of enlightening the ignorant, inspiring confidence in the doubting and superstitious, propagating Freethought, diffusing practical truth and knowledge throughout the world for the good of all our kind, that are, and yet will be, in the rising and coming generations; not forgetting the debt of gratitude to those who preceded us, and made the way possible for us, which should incite each and every Liberal to extra effort to make their sacrifices yield at least a hundred-fold. And as we bid the old year a last good-night, the new, a glad good-morn, may we feel the going out of her last moments hav not been in vain for our cause, but the one ever memorable for the effort put forth both in Europe and America for a higher plane of enlightenment, for the highest good of all mankind, and ultimately the secularization of the world. In connection with this, I would like to add a small yet noticeable feature to aid in advertising the good work which is going on, weaning, as it were, the mind from the old ruts to a wider field of usefulness, which I trust many rational beings will adopt in the near future, though no easy task, yet I would not retreat from the simple idea that will bear upon our cause, which in the aggregate will swell the current, and incite some to think, and result in much good. I would make this proposition, viz., that all Liberals should hav their visiting cards with our motto, "U. M. L."—Universal Mental Liberty—stamped conspicuously upon their surface, thus calling the attention of all who see them to our creeds. I will be prepared next month to furnish all Liberals who will favor me with their orders, with visiting and new year calling cards, written or printed, at popular prices, stamped "U. M. L.," no extra charge for stamp, and five per cent of all orders from Liberals I will return to the Liberal Fund. Liberals will observe my advertisment in December TRUTH SEEKER.

GEO. KRAHMER.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Nov. 20, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I started out two months ago on foot, and went here and there in town and country, in the great heat, and suffering with fatigue and my chronic ailments, to get subscribers to the petition, which I send with this. It contains two hundred names, and I could hav found many more if I could hav had a horse, and been in good health. It was no delightful job, but there seemed to be no one else who would do it. I met with every kind of character and reception. Some signed it promptly and with avidity; some slowly and reluctantly. Many admitted that it was right and just, but would not sign it, as it would "not do any good," or it would make them "unpopular in their business." One man, a Greenbacker but a bigot, said, "Professor, you want I should vote God Almighty out of existence." "Sir," said I, "if you hav a God you can vote out of existence, he must be very far from almighty, and you are more powerful than he." A large number of the names are German. The Democrats are more ready to sign than the Republicans, and the farmers and miners than the merchants and professional men. I discovered how profoundly ignorant people generally are on this subject of taxation, and the relation of church and state, and what dupes and slaves they are to both, and what loose and undefined ideas they hav of natural right and justice, and what blind faith they hav in priests, lawyers, etc.

Yours for humanity, J. H. COOK.

WEST WINFIELD, N. Y., Nov. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Two weeks ago, Moody, the evangelist, was advertised to be in the city of Utica, N. Y. The ministers of the city took charge of the show and issued tickets to Christians—only to council and plan for the conversion of sinners, Moody furnishing singing books. The committee having charge of the books now ask those that took books away to return them, and the committee say they will hav to pay for fifty dollars' worth of books.

Who will dare say that Christianity is not improving the morals of that city? Comments are unnecessary.

E. F. BEALS,

NEW YORK, Nov. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER, of Nov. 22d, under the heading, "India Ahead," appears an article, from R. S. Sidelinger, of Boston, for the advancement of the so-called new calendar. Whatever the Christian era may be, it is now in general use, and no one need date the "year of our Lord." If a new era is to be adopted and wanted, I, for my part, do not wish to hav a sectional one, but a general one, one counting from the earliest time known, and to be acceptable if possible to all nations and adopted by them by consent, and hav done away with the two ways of counting forward and also backward. There is not one benefit to be gained by this new calendar, of which Mr. Geo. N. Hill claims to be the originator, but, to the contrary, it is a deception and a fraud, as he wants it started and commenced with the year 1600, and then to fall in and run with the present time, that is, 284, instead as it should then be, 285. I can safely predict that it will fail, and will never be adpoted, except by a few whose zeal outruns common sense, and who will thereby expose themselvs to the just derision of any schoolboy who has passed arithmetic.

FRED. KOZLY.

JOE CAFFRAY AND SLATE-WRITING.

SNOWVILLE, VA.

MR. EDITOR: Not being able to find any slate-writing medium in New York or Brooklyn, I went on to Boston. I had received the advertisment of Joseph Caffray from nearly every prominent Spiritualist that I had written to, even from the Banner of Light office. So Oct. 2d I started to look him up. I found the place, but was told there was no admittance till 2 o'clock, "circle hour," so I went to the Union Hotel, and made the acquaintance of the Misses Tilton and John Storer Cobb, and had a very pleasant and interesting seance with them. It if a choice privilege to make the personal acquaintance of friends you hav learned to know and respect through the press.

At 2 P.M. I was again at Caffray's. He met me at the door, and as soon as he saw I had slates with me, he said he would not use any but his own slates at public seances, but that he would giv me a private seance at 3 o'clock. I thought it would be worth two dollars extra to hav my own slates used, and also to hav the full seance all to myself. So at 4 o'clock I went again. But when I unwrapped my slates Caffray said he could not use them because they were bound in cloth. I saw I was in for it, and must submit to "conditions," or hav no results. So I consented to let him substitute the usual five-cent slates, of which he had a large pile already "magnetized." I cleaned off two of them, and asked if I might mark them and keep them in sight. He flew up and said, "What makes you so suspicious?" So I was squelched, and humbly submitted to his lead. Then when he was looking ceiling-wards for spirit aid I quickly marked the frames of both slates so I would know them again, and be sure the writing was on them and no others. He requested me to write the names of three of my dead friends, and what relation they stood to me. I did this upon slips of paper he gave me. I wrote, "D. M. Bennett, a friend; Eliza Drake, mother; Lillian Slenker, daughter." He soon named Bennett as a spirit standing by me, and handing me a paper. Then he took the folded slips and held them to his forehead a moment, and finally tore them in fragments and threw them on the stand; but pretty soon he gathered up the bits and left the room, sending his wife to keep me company. He was gone quite a spell—long enough to write messages to fit the names. Then he came back and fussed about, "magnetizing the slates," bringing others and piling on top of them, and then putting them away again, and finally he suddenly took the two I had marked and passed them under his side of the table, telling me to lift the cover on my side and reach under and take hold of the slates, and be sure and keep hold. I knew at once that this was his chance, and sure enough a few moments afterward he told me to lay the slates on top of the table again, and I did so. I found on looking at them my pencil marks were gone, and the slates had been changed. But as I had come for writing, I was determined to get it, so I let him go on managing as he chose. He laid the slates on my head, on my shoulder, and in various positions. He got raps that the spirits refused to write. He then talked in wheedling tones to them, saying, "Won't you write? Do please write. Now, do write for the lady." Finally he said, "You ask them." I felt ashamed of the farce, but to humor the thing I said, "Will the spirits write for me?" "Yes," was immediately rapped, and the slates were slipped to the edge of the table, so the medium could get his finger-nails on the under side. I soon heard a scratching; then he moved them to my shoulder and scratched more, and said with emotion, "They are filling the slates full for you; don't you hear them?" I said, "I hear a scratching." The raps came, denoting that they were done, and Joe offered to read the messages for me. I consented, for I knew he could read his own writing better than I could. He cut the string, and triumphantly showed two full sides of writing—across one was written diagonally, "I am here. D. M. Bennett." I don't think Bennett would hav given Elmina that sort of a greeting had he known who it was himself. Then he read the one signed by my mother's name: "My dear child, I am glad to see you here to-day. You are now right; go on; never mind what any one says. Your dear friends are all near you, and I hope you will sit, and I will come and write for you. Your mother, Eliza Drake." The hand is not my mother's, the style is not hers, nor is the communication at all what she would hav said. She always commenced, "Dear Lib," or "Dear Elmina," and wrote in Quaker language. The other message read thuswise: "Dear mother, it givs me great joy to see you looking into this beautiful truth. O mother, I hav a beautiful home over here! I am so happy. Be of good cheer, mother. I will yet come to you and show myself. If you will sit as the medium will tell you, I will come and write for you on these slates, as you see me write here, and do for me, and you will be happy. Your home will be with me when you come over here. I am still your angel daughter, Lillian Slenk—"* Not one word for father or her only brother, both of whom she idolized. Of course Joe did not know of them! I said, "I shall hav these communications printed." "Oh, yes," said Joe. "The Banner of Light will print them." But I'm afraid the Banner might not do it, so I send them to THE TRUTH SEEKER first, and will perhaps giv a brief history of Mr. Caffray next time. ELMINA.

*One more proof that Caffray read my slips is that I rarely write the Slenker in full. I run it out after the k. His was signed in that way, and he hesitated and said, "I can't make out the last of the name." Of course he couldn't.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Nov. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: There has been considerable said of late through THE TRUTH SEEKER upon the subject of Spiritualism. In the numerous articles and letters treating of this subject, there hav been various attempts (successful or unsuccessful) to adduce facts bearing upon the subject both pro and con. In writing about a subject held so sacred as this one is held by the Spiritualists, persons naturally reveal their feelings. That is the actual state of their consciousness, and we thus hav a class of facts that seem to indicate what the result of a test of their belief would be.

I do not mean to question the truthfulness or honesty of anyone whose statements I may consider. I believe it is possible for persons to mistake even their own belief. It is characteristic of Spiritualists to claim to know beyond the possibility of a doubt that Spiritualism is true. The defense of this position is always personal knowledge. Yet again we find such persons shaken, or seemingly shaken, at least, in their belief, and sometimes horror-struck, almost, when facts are produced that are detrimental to their cherished belief. I will giv a few examples. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 9th, Mr. Otto Wettstein published his "Realistic Meditations," in which he sets forth what he conceives to be some of the difficulties attending a belief in spirits. This has elicited a number of replies, in some of which there is that which indicates that the writers are not certain that there is a real to satiate their longing.

First, Mr. Seward Mitchell, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 30th, falls little short of appealing to Mr. Wettstein to forbear. He says, "Your communication in the last TRUTH SEEKER chills every drop of blood in my veins, and makes me sick and sad."

A belief that thus fears investigation is not real; it is fancied. It is rather a desire mistaken for belief. By quoting a little further this will be apparent: "If we Spiritualists are mistaken; if death ends all, even then our belief is more cheering, for it is the only philosophy or religion that has any incentiv to noble lives; the only belief that has any sweet, soul-elevating music in it." Further along he asks of Mr. Wettstein, "What is there in your cold philosophy to cheer our sad lives?"

Turning to the letter of E. N. Kingsley, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 6th, we find that his faith, too, is sustained as much by feeling as by judgment. Why is he "anxious?" Because he is conscious of uncertainty. Read what he says: "If this is true, has he (Mr. Wettstein) not destroyed all the highest hopes and aspirations of mankind, for cold, gloomy, dark, and lifeless Materialism, with its 'death ends all?' We are very anxious to understand and know the pro and con of this, the most important subject that can engage and occupy the mind of man," and so on.

In Mr. Perry's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 13th, we find the following: "In the face of some thirty years of experience that hav addressed themselvs to my intellect, and for which no rational explanation has yet approached the subject to be compared to that of the spiritual, . . . I am satisfied that no explanation based on the theory of a general diffusion of mind, or any other thing or substance in nature, can be put in the place of a spirit or spirits to account for such phenomena as I hav witnessed; and for anyone to assume to disbelieve it all in the face of millions of witnesses . . . is simply dodging the question," and so on. From the foregoing quotation it is clear, firstly, that Mr. Perry, during some thirty years of experience, has witnessed some very important phenomena; secondly, that he thinks it should be explained; and that now, and to this end, thirdly, his attention has been called to the theory of a general dispersion of mind, and perhaps others; in fact, he has so thoroughly investigated the subject that he thinks there can be no theory based upon any substance in nature equal to that of a spirit or spirits; fourthly, that, not having found a complete explanation, he takes what he thinks to be the best, which is the spiritual. It is now clear that Mr. Perry is not certain that Spiritualism is true; but he hopes that it is, for, like others named, he thinks any other belief would be "chilling." His belief, as he unconsciously acknowledges, is a mere preference. I will quote the following as proof: "No matter how indifferently the subject may be treated by a few, the millions are fast enlisting under the banner of the spirits, and defying the ridicule and contempt of facts, and until they are rationally accounted for, aside from a belief in the works of spirits, the millions will cling to the doctrins of the genial summer-land in preference [notice why they embrace it] to the chilling philosophy of a Materialism that is lifeless."

In conclusion, does it not crop out that many Spiritualists are deceived much in the same way as people are who get anxious to be "filled with the Holy Ghost" and finally persuade themselvs that they actually hav been "filled," but who afterward find out that they were deceived by their feelings or desires? I hav known Spiritualists to realize this.

Respectfully, L. N. WALLIS.

FARLEY, IOWA, Nov. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It seems to me that now is the time for all Liberals and Secularists to unite and organize for political work. The late election shows us plainly that the balance of power is certainly within our reach. Most of the states North show such small majorities for either of the old parties that the Liberal element, voting solid together, can dictate which party shall win. Then, by annually voting against any party in power which refuses to grant at least a part of our Demands, we shall very soon receive bids for our ballots. We may not get all that we ask at once. Neither should we expect it. Remember, we are demanding what to the average voter seems "a mighty sight," "a heap," and we must not expect either of the political parties to shoulder the whole load at once. Should either party undertake it, it would probably lose more votes than we should be able to duplicate. We should ask no more of any party than it is able to grant. We ought not ask it to die for us. I firmly believe that if we reduced our Demands to simply the taxation of church property, and then work and organize for that, we would gain our point very soon in most of the Northern states. H. GILMORE.

LEMORE, NEB., Nov. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please let me state that Liberalism is spreading like oil on water in this part of our Union, notwithstanding the persistent efforts of the reverends. To show the state of feeling, I will mention a case happening here—that of T. J. Conley, Three Rivers Post Office, this county, whos family was approached in his absence, converted, and would hav been baptized (immersed) in the cold waters of the river but for the timely appearance on the scene of Mr. Conley, who was the maddest man of which there is any record. It was only with the assurance that any attempt to further this outrage would furnish the D. D. with a pair of wings and a harp before he could reach the bank of the river that it was stopped. A peculiar feature of this case is, Mr. Conley's wife and five daughters were converted, while Mr. Conley and three boys were left out in the cold. This savors of Solomon's time. UNSANCTIFIED.

CLAYVILLE, Nov. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is sometimes assumed in a controversial debate that all things were produced and are regulated and controled by the laws of nature. But this assertion only provokes a question that demands attention: What is here meant by nature? Does it mean the materials of which the planets and the world are composed, the simple elementary principles of all things? If this be the meaning, the conclusion unavoidably follows that nature is nothing more nor less than matter. And what are the laws of matter? Every man who has reflected on this subject will answer that one great and pervading law of matter is inertia, or the incapability of motion, until some power is applied to giv it the force of action; and we think every skeptic will readily admit that life and motion are not original and independent qualities of inanimate matter, but will contend that they are the effect of organization. The anxious truth seeker can now see the subject in a tangible form, and understand the bearings and force of the whole argument. Matter is inert, and life is the result of some particular combination of matter. The question now to be decided, is, What power brought matter into that state of organization necessary to constitute being, and inspired it with life and motion? For no such power is found in unorganized matter, and surely none will be so perversely unreasonable as to suppose that mere matter could confer that which it never possessed. And if by some strange and fortunate freak of blind chance, matter should exert a power which it never possessed, and succeed in effecting an organizalion, it might be questioned whether life would be the necessary result.

Now I hav an irresistible desire to know how the great fountain-head of intelligence originated, if it had an origin. If it had no origin, it is self-existent and never will go into unconscious annihilation. Come, Mr. Materialist, giv us your best thoughts on this subject. I guess that intelligence, or mind and matter, are coeternal. J. B. SMITH.

READING, KAN., Nov. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Liberalists see so much truth, and sound and common sense in the views and arguments of periodicals and lecturers espousing our cause, that we sometimes think it strange that persons whom we know to possess sound reason, and, upon all other subjects, we can approach with the assurance of satisfaction, that they, apparently, cannot see the value of our purpose, or the grandeur of our cause. Of these there are two classes. The first and most numerous class is composed of persons who hav never recognized that the church had any claims upon them. They hav been raised outside the pale of the church, and care no more for the orthodox pulpit than they do for the Spanish bull-pit. Such people cannot understand why we are so earnest in our efforts to destroy the influence of the church. They very naturally say, "Why don't you let them alone, as I do, if you don't like them?" While they hav no use for the chuuch, and, under some circumstances, would hav been co-workers with us, it cannot be so from the fact that they cannot realize the magnitude of the hypocrisy, ignorance, superstition, cowardice, and mental slavery, dishonesty and falsehood, with which the church is trammeling the minds of our children and rising generation. Some of this class are those who possess sufficient sound common sense and reason to enable them to scoff and deride the pleadings and claims of the church. And others of the same class hav been raised from childhood under the influence of such. The other or second class are those in the church, or are directly under its control and influence. There are none so blind as those that won't see. Special pains hav been taken to circulate among the church-members and its sympathizers Remsburg's "Bible Morals," which seems to us a fairly clear showing as against the Bible as a just and moral guide. No argument is produced against it, neither can there be, as it is a simple statement of texts and facts therein contained. These slaves of the cross simply say to each other, "The devil is in our midst, and we must fight him with our zeal." Our observation is that Freethinkers generally are persons who hav been under church rule and learned its rottenness. Is it a fact that we must accept the churches as nurseries to grow up workers for Liberalism? W. H. PENFIELD.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Nov. 16, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I believe "Bible Morals" to be the most condensed and complete refutation of the Bible it has ever been my pleasure to read.

As good as THE TRUTH SEEKER is, I wish to suggest what I think would be an improvement—i. e., head the first column of notes and clippings with an index of each number's contents, as many of its readers keep them on file, and as articles are referred to and replied to weeks after publication, such an index would be a great help in reviewing them.

"The Georgia Wonder," Lulu Hurst, has been here and gone, and as I hav seen several conflicting reports—some in THE TRUTH SEEKER—concerning the marvelous power accompanying her, some claiming it to be mere muscular power skilfully managed, while others say it is something beyond our present knowledge and independent of muscular force, and having been one of a number of umbrella and chair wrestlers, I believe I am competent to judge, and so cast my vote with the last-named class. But if preventing six stout men from pressing a chair to the floor by simply laying her hands upon the cane seating, or the lifting a chair several inches from the floor with two heavy men seated thereon by slightly laying one hand upon the post without grasping it, is a common feat that anybody can perform, then I confess myself fooled, with several other at least intelligent-looking men. What man knows would make a large book, but I think what he don't know would make a whole library. Yours for truth,

H. H. HUTCHESON.

STOUGHTON, MASS., Nov. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 for two trial subscriptions. I find your paper able, true, and brimful of some of the grandest thoughts of the age. I wish I could do more for you, but my business cares are such that I do not seem to get much time for missionary work. However, I shall send you more names in a week or two. Your TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is an admirable compilation, and I sincerely trust you will not fail to issue it every year. P. N. COOK.

SEWARD, NEB., Oct. 31, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In the year 1871 we started a League in this place. We had to contend against both "tide and wind;" we were few in number, rent high, and drifted around from one room to another, until the enterprise was abandoned. The time is close at hand when we take the bull by the horns, and shake off all opposition as easily as a lion shakes the dew from his mane. On the 5th and 6th of November we hav two able lectures on Freethought. On the 9th of November Professor W. F. Jamieson commences a series of six lectures. Jamieson is one of the best in the Union. While these men are here we will organize a League. Don't that make you feel good? It does me. Then we will start a boom on THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Whither?

My desolate house is in mourning,
A spe'ter in all of the rooms;
The light goes out from the windows,
The sweetness from all of the blooms.
A shower of white stars is drifting,
And rude winds bear them away,
My birdlings hav flown from the roof-tree,
And left me so lonely to-day.

There were sad tears almost arising,
But I buried them deep in my heart;
I had known the future would beckon,
And I bade my repinings depart.
The world and its workers are calling,
Their light spans the earth as a zone,
The trend of the ages is onward—
Let us hasten the hands of our own.

Humanity hearkens her heroes,
And blazons their names on the sky,
The temples of Time ring with voices
That speed as the bright planets by.
The workshop and senate are open,
And newer fields glow on the plains,
The camp-fires of Honor are burning,
And Truth plants her small golden grains.

The white-hearted quarry is forming
To build, as the near ages must,
A home for each one that is homeless—
Let the Past guard its bones and its dust.
New dawns their Raphaels are bringing,
Grand masters awaken the morn,
To write with the sermon on granit,
A creed that has never been born.

Though a torn hat or jacket may greet us,
And seem to belong to the dead,
And vacant the spaces that meet us,
While the light and the laughter hav fled;
There are dim hights over the mountains
Where Fame weaves her song and her spell,
Though empty the little low chamber,
It is well with us, still it is well.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Human Nature, and the Study of the Human Voice.

There is no more important subject of study than that of the human voice. It conveys the secret motivs of the talker, and will giv you a key to the inner character of the person, no matter how deceitful or evil-minded he may be, especially when the voice is coupled with the acts of the individual. In its natural expression, where no concealment is intended, the modulations are fraught with every emotion and feeling of the soul life within. You will notice how tenderly the voice will vibrate, and with what delicate effects the "shake and quiver" will fall upon the ears of the afflicted and suffering. How sympathetically and soothingly the feelings are imparted in the kind words we hear in the hour of distress or trouble. In like manner, we find that every other feeling is expressed in sounds becoming more and more perfect and intelligible as we ascend the scale of life, from the lowest animal that manifests it through organic formation, to the most refined and cultured orator, or the grandest actor that treads the boards of a theater. And for this reason there is no place where human nature is so fairly portrayed as the stage. There it is in all its varieties of expression, the especial study of the artist.

As no one actor can feel all the characteristics of humanity in the highest degree, it becomes necessary to divide the art into various parts, so as to get the highest perfection in each department, and present them in one play, hence we hav tragedians, comedians, etc., and each actor will be perfect in the part in proportion to his study of the gesture and voice of each character.

Hence, in truth, "All the world is a stage, and all the men and women merely players."

Knowing the importance of the voice in detecting real motivs, the wicked and deceitful will resort to dissembling in order to throw us off our guard, and thus, by affecting to be honest and kind, will deceive us into a false security, the more surely to defraud and harm us. Therefore it becomes necessary to study the act and voice in the same individual. If a strange man givs you a hearty shake with one hand, and a cordial greeting, while you feel his other hand fumbling your watch-chain, or your pocket, the act and the voice do not harmonize, and it is time to release his hold. It is the means used which is best calculated to throw you off guard and harm you, but if you hav studied the voice with profit, you may detect the poison concealed in each word or sentence, as no one can express naturally two opposit feelings at the same moment, and the shrewd person will detect the rogue as easily as he can read the false and imperfect lines in a bank-note made by the counterfeiter.

Having made humanity a study from my earliest experiences in life, it has been a source of great pleasure and profit to me, and, I think, in one or more cases saved my life or protected me from great bodily harm, to illustrate which I will relate a true story:

About eighteen years ago, in this city, the first railway was put into operation; other coal fields enjoyed them earlier on account of the great advantages they possessed over this valley, as here, although we hav the best coal, the mountains surrounding us are upward of a thousand feet in hight, and it required a thirteen-mile grade to run this heavy material out of the valley and surmount this obstacle to trade.

During this time all sorts of humanity, from all parts of the world, were engaged for years in getting these railways into activ operation, and often night was made hideous by the noises of drunken and fighting men, who prowled around at all unseasonable hours in their debauchery and profanity.

Upon this particular occasion, while at supper, we heard a terrible outcry, as if coming from some one in great distress. Upon the impulse, I put on my hat and proceeded to the front door, but before opening it concluded to wait for another outbreak, which soon followed. There was something so peculiar in the voice that I immediately checked myself and concluded to go out by way of the yard gate. When I got there, I found a man lying in the snow, as still as if asleep. I shook him and spoke to him, and endeavored to lift him upon his feet, supposing him drunk; but to my surprise he bounded up in an instant and entered the gate. By this time my suspicions were awakened, and a neighbor happening along, we followed him to the kitchen door, which he entered. At first I supposed he had been in some kind of fit and got up bewildered, but when he seated himself at the stove I asked him to drink a cup of hot coffee or tea and hav something to eat, but he said he was cold—would as soon drink a cup of poison as anything—wanted to know what I meant by offering him coffee, and why I did not keep a hotter stove on such a cold night. In fact, his words and actions were calculated to create fears, as I saw that he was a desperate character, and concluded that his actions at the yard gate were only a ruse to gain admittance into the house. But in order to let him understand that I was not afraid of him, I said he could come into the front room to a large stove, if that was all he wanted, and warm up.

As soon as I opened the door he darted in, and perceiving a side room and bed, jumped into it, boots, clothing, and all. There was something so outrageous in this conduct that I made up my mind that charity was ill-bestowed on such customers, and, taking him by the coat collar and throwing my whole avoirdupois—about 180 pounds—in the opposit direction, I landed him upon the floor in absolute astonishment. This convinced him that I was the wrong customer to be imposed upon, and seeing that his little plan of getting a bed to himself from which he could at any time of the night get out and hav the house to himself and companions to do what they pleased, was greatly astonished. He took a seat by the stove, and said that if I would let him out he would go away peaceably, which I did, first insisting on an explanation of his conduct. This he refused to giv, but said: "I see you are a man that can take care of your own, and it is well you acted as you did. You are all right, there will no harm befall you."

There is no doubt that there was a deep-laid plan to rob me or do worse. I watched for several days afterwards, and one day discovered my man coming up the way. I met him and handed him a glove which he left on the occasion above referred to. He did not want me to recognize him, and would not own the glove at first, but when I assured him he was known, he took it, and remarked that I was a "good man."

A year or two thereafter, one night after bed time, I was aroused by some one rapping at the door of an addition building we were then erecting, the one in which I am now writing. I said, "Who's there?" A soft, delicate voice answered, "No one that will hurt you." It proved to be a foot-sore traveler, who had got into the valley after dark, and too late for hotels even, and, spying the new addition, he concluded to ask for the privilege of a lodging in the shavings. He said he had no matches, and would be careful, and, that as he had no money, he had been refused shelter several times. That voice was as innocent and sincere to my ears as truth could make it. I could adminster to his comfort without any fears, so I got up and conducted him into the place where he insisted on staying, and tucked him into a nice large nest; then pulled the work bench over him, and left him to such dreams as he might be favored with. In the morning I got up quite early, not caring to disturb any of the family, and prepared as good a breakfast as cold food ready cooked would warrant, and, passing into the new addition, I found my lodger ready for his march, a perfectly sober, sincere, honest, but poverty-stricken mortal. After a little preliminary conversation, I invited him into the dining room to eat something that would sustain him in his day's march. This he said was more than he expected, but after washing and combing up, he ate a hearty meal. I then filled his sack with a day's provisions, and handed him what small change I had in my pockets—about forty cents. He was very much astonished and pleased. He gave me a warm shaking of the hand as we parted, and with large tears filling his eyes, and emotions of thankfulness expressed in the deep melody of his faltering voice, he said, "My friend, I hav traveled a great deal in my time, but this is the first time in my life that any one has paid me money for lodging with him." I hav narrated these contrasting incidents to illustrate the difference of voice and conduct, and to show the necessity of making the human voice a study of the feelings which govern it. J. R. PERRY.

QUAD HOC SIBI VULT?

By that mother's love, her only hope on high,
In every star you see a-gleaming nigh,
Round all this wandering host above,
Do doubly show the work of love,
Caps each cloud with crown of gold,
And making fishermen, even, bold,
Going to sea, with awkward grace,
Each sail and spar rotting in place,
For well they know renewal is in vain,
Unless they would keep lovers in the rain.
Let them love; and over this thing delve;
Light cigars and pipe; release the twelve.

INVOLVED CHARADE.

An instant's space, less than a minute,
And yet we trace a sign within it.
Jonah's sign was a little too much,
This, I opine, is much too little;
But the Christ divine, with deific touch,
Could giv that a gentle whittle,
And cut off a day and a half or such.
But often I grieve that his whale-ship's victual
Could not quicker make him sicker,
Or that Mary's son was so slow to rise.
It would, at least, hav saved all dicker
About discrepancies, or lies.
Though Theologicus can fit all
Signs in time to some event,
Yet my reliance is upon no saint.
On Freethought puzzlers I must call—
Hoc signo vinces—"by this sign
I hav conquered"—all the nine.
And now please solve this crypt of mine,
This word with another word in it,
This sign, in less than a minute.

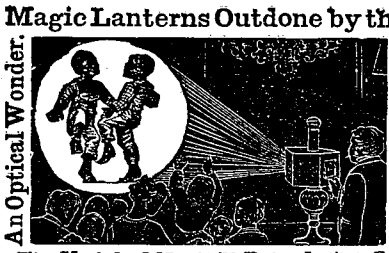
CLEAR WATER, NEB., Nov. 16, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a reader of the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I liv out in northwestern Nebraska. We hav very good schools for a new country. There is one college and one seminary in this county. The school that I go to is one mile and a half from home. I ride to school on horseback. I hav played on the violin for two years. I am thirteen years old next Christmas. I hav been helping my father pick corn some this fall, on Saturdays. Good-bye, EARLE A. FINCH.

P. S.—You wrote a kind letter to my mother, and we were much pleased with it. E. A. F.

[Earle has written a very pretty letter, concise and comprehensiv. We are always happy to hear from the friends who love Our Corner, and we would be pleased to hav them write oftener, and thus become acquainted with each other.—ED]

PHONOGRAPHY & TYPEWRITING.



Many a bright young man or woman would like to come to New York to commence a business career. The best way is to learn these arts. They are now professions that are increasing in demand, and not yet full. I instruct young persons thoroughly, and get them positions. It takes five months to gain the requisit phonographic speed, 100 words a minute. Terms, $50 for the course, payable $10 monthly in advance.

Typewriting requires about two months practice, and can be learned along with phonography—only $10 extra. Send for circular. Address,

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

New Years Gift Presentation,

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE 28TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE

ROCHELLE JEWELRY STORE.

January 1, 1885,

At 2 P. M., ROCHELLE, ILL.

Last year on New Year's day Wettstein presented to his patrons assembled in Armory Hall, a valuable collection of beautiful presents, comprising 10 Gold Watches and Gold Chains; half a dozen genuin Diamond Pins, Rings, and Eardrops; over a dozen fine Silver Watches, solid Gold Jewelry, elegant Silverware, Fancy Goods, etc., ranging in price from $1.00 to $100.00.

This I propose to do this year and to giv my Liberal friends abroad an opportunity to receive a nice present.

The aggregate of goods presented will not be less than $1,500, and probably $2,000, according to amount of goods sold.

To all my customers sending $1.00 or more for goods or work, I shall present, for each and every dollar, a certificate entitling the owner to one or more shares in these gifts.

This is the fairest and most liberal offer ever made by any merchant in America My stock is complete in everything pertaining to a first-class jewelry store; prices now averaging 25 per cent below those of largest cities; goods sent by mail or express to all parts of the world accompanied by one certificate for every dollar remitted, and cash refunded if not satisfactory, and returned same day received.

Prices on watches again reduced since last price list in this paper. The presents will be presented in a public hall of Rochelle, directly to my customers, or to a committee selected by them at that time, in one entire lot, and the mode of distribution will be optional with them.

Everybody pleased last year, and all must be pleased this year.

Circulars giving all particulars and describing style and value of each gift, mailed free on application. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

18.00. DR. L. TENNEY'S EUREKA

Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

THE most really Christian nations hav been, and still are, the most devoted to the pursuit of gain, the most rigidly and ostentatiously Christian sections of these nations—shall we say the Quakers and the Scotch?—hav been among the steadiest and most quietly successful in the search. Nor do they even affect to fancy that they are wrong or disobedient in thus eagerly striving for that wealth which their master so distinctly ordered them to eschew and dread; they put aside or pass by his teaching with a sort of unsparing consciousness, as if it in no way concerned them; with a curious unanimity they note his exhortations obsolete, abstract, or impracticable; the most respectable of the religious world giv one day to their savior and six days to their ledger; the most pious banker, the purest liver, the most benevolent nobleman, never dreams of "despising riches," or of casting from him his superfluous possessions as a snare to his feet and a peril to his soul.—W. R. Greg.

THE name of Jonathan Edwards suggested a discussion upon freewill and necessity upon which poor Boswell was much given to worry himself. Some time afterward Johnson wrote to him, in answer to one of his lamentations: "I hoped you had got rid of this hypocrisy of misery. What hav you to do with 'liberty and necessity?' Or what more than to hold your tongue about it?" Boswell could never take this sensible advice; but he got little comfort from his oracle. "We know that we are all free and there's an end on't," was his statement on one occasion, and now he could only say, All theory is against the freedom of the will and all experience for it.—Leslie Stephen's Johnson. NOTE.—If any man, as rude as Johnson himself, had been present and had he chosen to encounter the great bear, he would hav told him flatly that neither Boswell or he—the great Doctor Johnson—knew what they were taking about. It was a clear case of the "blind leading the blind, and both falling into the ditch." Johnson, as a Metaphysician, everywhere cuts a poor figure, and he was no more fit to understand the question of liberty and necessity than blind Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, could see until he was cured, as the story goes, of his blindness by our savior, in the vicinity of Jericho. See Mark x, 46. Poor Boswell! Poor Johnson! Poor humanity! seeking stable footing where no footing is to be found!—Hylax.

IT is certain from experience that the smallest grain of natural honesty and benevolence has more effect in men's conduct than the most pompous views suggested by theological theories and systems. A man's natural inclination works incessantly upon him; it is forever present to the mind; and mingles itself with every view and consideration; whereas religious motivs, where they act at all, operate only by starts and bounds; and it is scarcely possible for them to become altogether habitual to the mind. The force of the greatest gravity, say the philosophers, is infinitly small in comparison to that of the least impulse; yet it is certain that the smallest gravity will, in the end, prevail above a great impulse, because no strokes or blows can be repeated with such constancy as attraction and gravitation.—Hume's Dialogs Concerning Natural Religion.

THE six thousand years which were counted in the Christian schools since the so-called creation of the world and man, hav long ago grown to be as many tens, if not hundreds of thousands, of years, since the formation of man alone, notwithstanding all the difficulties attendant on a correct estimation of the position of human remains beneath alluvial soil, needing long periods for its formation. This estimate rests on an incomparably surer basis than did the old one, based on the biblical text of the ages of the patriarchs.—D. F. Strauss.

WHOSO would be a man must be a non-conformist. He who would gather immortal palms must not be hindered by the name of goodness, but must explore it and see if it be goodness. Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind. Absolve you to yourself and you shall hav the suffrage of the world.—Emerson.

The political aim of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which are as follows:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis, and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

In philosophy, THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates the upbuilding of a rational system that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. It is, therefore, both destructive and constructive.

Among the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most eminent men and brilliant writers in the Liberal ranks of the United States, including Courtlandt Palmer, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, T. C. Leland, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, W. S. Bush, Elliott Preston, John Peck, J. L. York, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Slenker, and many other able men and women. THE TRUTH SEEKER also makes a feature of reprinting the ablest English essayists and philosophers, and during 1884 has given its readers several papers from the pens of Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. The home contributors are legion, and the communications embrace the widest possible range of subjects—religious, philosophic, Anarchistic, Socialistic, land reform, tariff and political reform.

EVERY LIBERAL IN THE COUNTRY WANTS THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DEPARTMENTS:

In the League Department is recorded the news of the National Liberal League, furnished to our columns by the secretary, and other officers of the National and auxiliary Leagues.

We also have an able correspondent in Canada, who furnishes weekly news of the Freethought movement in that dominion.

Our Children's Department is edited by one of the best and most successful writers for children in the United States. Miss Susan H. Wixon is widely known, not only in the Freethought ranks, but as a writer for popular papers and magazines. We have from all sides the strongest testimonials to the efficiency of her work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She will continue the Department through 1885.

Through the department of "Letters from Friends" hundreds of subscribers have made pleasant acquaintances and lasting friendships. Its two pages are a place for exchange of thoughts, relation of experiences, and whatever the friends of Freethought find occasion to say. This department is a "talk together" of great and varied interest.

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER MAY BE GIVEN:

If any of our readers desire to read one of the best Freethought and reform journals published, we should unhesitatingly recommend to them THE TRUTH SEEKER, published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York, at $3 per annum. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a large, sixteen-page paper, and is filled each week with the choicest literature pertaining to Freethought and the overthrow of superstitions. It also ably discusses reforms politically and socially, and is really one of the best papers we have ever read. It is bold and fearless in its denunciations of kingcraft, priestcraft, and all other ways and means by which the people are held in bondage and ignorance, and no one can read THE TRUTH SEEKER a year without becoming nobler and better. You can get the paper three months on trial for fifty cents, and if you try it you will not want to be without it thereafter.—Rochester, N. H., Anti-Monopolist.

One of the finest monuments ever seen in this country has recently been erected to the memory of D. M. Bennett, founder of that able advocate of Freethought, THE TRUTH SEEKER, in Greenwood Cemetery, New York. One thousand friends of the dead journalist, admirers of his sterling qualities and the beauty of thought, goodness of heart, and the self-abnegation which distinguished his life, contributed to the fund by which this magnificent memorial was erected. A colored lithograph of this beautiful memorial has just reached us In reality it is a present that is appreciated more than cold words can express. Besides a view of the monument there is a fine likeness of Mr. Bennett. On the monument are engraved many of the famous utterances of the departed Liberal as well as the record of his life and the work to which many years of his activ manhood were devoted. THE TRUTH SEEKER perpetuates the fame of its founder by this truly generous act, and while accepting its generosity with thanks it is but just and proper that we should add our testimony to that of thousands of others who have many times declared that as an advocate of free thought, free speech, and all that is ennobling in nature THE TRUTH SEEKER has no superior in the universe.—Lackawanna Democrat.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is an iconoclastic journal. The sworn foe of superstition and error in all its forms, its motto might appropriately be, War, war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt—for it never lets a chance go by to hit superstition a resounding blow. It is a first-class exponent of what we call fighting Liberalism. . . . Under the direction of Mr. E. M. Macdonald, it still flourishes. Besides numerous articles of a polemic character, it contains a department for children, "Notes," "News," "Gems of Thought," "Odds and Ends," and numerous letters from correspondents. Besides THE TRUTH SEEKER, the firm publishes also Liberal books, one of the best specimens of which is their last publication, the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, a perfect gem, both in contents and finish, and which we would recommend to be sent for by those who are not yet acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER publications—The Sociologist.

Notes and Clippings.

A BED of oyster shells as large as dinner plates was discovered by a Tallahassee, Fla., man while digging a well.

LETTERS to the San Francisco newspapers complain that the missionaries in Alaska are, in many instances, unprincipled adventurers.

THE Common Council of Bronson, Mich., posts in ten public places the names of men to whom, in consequence of their habitual drunkenness, rum is not to be sold.

LIEUT. GREELY, commander of the Arctic exploring expedition, says that of his nineteen men who perished all but one were smokers, and that one was the last to die. The seven survivors were non-smoking men.

IN the course of a lecture in Chicago, Col. Robert Ingersoll wanted to know what minister had ever done as much for the world as Darwin, when a voice sang out, "Burchard." Even the colonel had to join in the laugh that followed this pat reply.

AFTER much experimenting, Dr. Richardson has found a satisfactory means of causing painless death, and has introduced it into the Home for Lost Dogs in London. The animals to be killed are placed in a chamber charged with a mixture of carbonic oxide and chloroform vapor, when they tranquilly fall asleep and wake no more.

THE late Archbishop Purcell's creditors wrote to the Plenary Council at Baltimore: "People are beginning to think that, if heaven needs all the substance of the widow and orphan to keep the clerical profession in affluence and splendor, it is time to retire from the sanctuary and delve for some other scheme of salvation."

"COME!" cried the exhorter to the landlord, "come! In the father's house there are many mansions." "And they don't hav to be repaired?" asked the landlord wistfully. "Never a repair!" said the exhorter. "Well, then, I'll come!" shouted the landlord, and in two minutes he was the loudest among the rescued sinners on the anxious seat.

OF the 34,000 newspapers of the world nearly 32,000 are published in Europe and North America, leaving little over 2,000 for all the rest of the world. South America only issues sufficient to allow each of its inhabitants three newspapers a year—exhibiting the curious contrast in this, as in all else, between the great northern and southern continents.

THE French Chamber of Deputies proposes to reduce still further the Budget for Public Worship. Four million francs are to be taken from the appropriations to the Roman Catholic church, and three hundred thousand from what has formerly been given for Protestant worship. The object is to make a separation between church and state in fact, though the leaders of the French government seem to shrink from doing this in form.

THE superintendent of a penitentiary was showing some visitors through the establishment. The convicts were at dinner. "I did not know," said one of the visitors, "that any difference was made in the food, yet I notice that while most of the poor fellows are served with meat, a few hav nothing but bread and coffee." "It is only on Fridays that any difference is made," explained the superintendent. "Some of the prisoners never eat meat on Fridays."

MR. ISRAEL HART, a Jew, has just been chosen mayor of Leicester, England. The principal general interest of the fact lies in the circumstance that about the year 1230, Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, granted a charter to the borough for the total exclusion of the Jews from Leicester, and they took refuge near the Jewry wall—a portion of which is still preserved. The charter recited, "Let it be universally known that I (Simon de Montfort), for the health of my soul, and the souls of my ancestors and successors, hav granted, and by this my present charter confirmed, for me and my heirs in perpetuity, to my burgesses of Leicester and their heirs, that no Jew or Jewess in my time, or in the time of my heirs, to the end of the world, shall, within the liberty of the town of Leicester, inhabit, remain, or obtain any residence." The end of the world is not yet; but Leicester—the Leicester of de Montfort—enjoys the administration of its first Jewish mayor. Times hav changed since the thirteenth century.

IN going from Unitarianism to Episcopalianism, the Rev. Martin K. Schermerhorn, of Newport, gives his opinion of the former ism: "As to Unitarianism, I will say that it has been a constant disappointment to me, though I always tried to make the best of it. In short, I lost all hope for any permanent growth of Unitarianism before I left Newport, and this in part was what providentially caused me to turn my studies and thoughts in the direction of the older church and faith."

THE late Dr. Macadam used to tell of a tipsy Scotchman, making his way home upon a bright Sunday morning, when the good folk were wending their way to the kirk. A little dog pulled a ribbon from the hand of a lady who was leading it, and as it ran away from her, she appealed to the first passer-by, who happened to be the inebriate, asking him to whistle for her poodle. "Woman!" he retorted, with that solemnity of visage which only a Scotchman can assume, "Woman, this is no day for whustlin'!"

THE Hotel Gazette of San Francisco thus relates what befell a holy man employed by our government to teach the sailors how to climb the Jacob's ladders that reach beyond the main trucks up to heaven: "One of the chaplains of the United States Navy came down from Mare Island on Tuesday, and, like all good chaplains, put up at the Occidental Hotel. Last night the pious man went out to view the local elephant, and he gazed also on the wine when it was red. About eleven o'clock he found himself lost somewhere on Sutter street and hailed a man with a request to show him to the Occidental Hotel. The man took him into an alley, a second man grabbed him around the neck, and the pair deserted him. The chaplain finally got to the Palace Hotel, registered, and then discovered that he had been robbed of a gold watch and chain valued at $150, and a money order on the treasury for $250. He reported his loss at police headquarters at two o'clock this morning, and mournfully went back to the Occidental to negotiate for shelter. His garb and face were solemn, but in the main he gave indications of a hilarious evening in society."

THE criminal statistics of the Board of Police Justices for the year ending with October indicate a very creditable condition of peace and order in the city of New York. The total number of prisoners arrested was 74,647, but of this number 22,730 were discharged, and of the arrests 20,445, and 6,275, were respectivly for the minor offenses of intoxication and vagrancy, while the great total of 28,696 were taken to the station houses for disorderly conduct only. The arrests for the more serious crimes were comparativly few; 715 for felonious assault and battery, 791 for burglary, 54 for forgery, 88 for homicide, 316 for robbery. In how many of these cases indictments were found and convictions followed we are not told in these statistics; but there is nothing in the figures to indicate that serious crime is on the increase in New York. The statistics as to the sex and nativity of the prisoners are interesting and suggestiv. Of the whole number, more than a third were born in the United States, less than a fifth in Ireland, and about a fourteenth in Germany. The Italians giv the criminal courts a good deal of trouble in proportion to their numbers. They are hot headed and violent, and we are not surprised to see that 1,707 of them were arrested during the year. About twice as many boys as girls were arrested, the males under fourteen years having been 2,248, as against 1,051 females. The growth of vice among young girls is one of the saddest and most disgraceful incidents of our present civilization, and it seems to be greater in London than in New York, even in proportion to the population.—Sun.

THE Emperor of Germany is a good deal puzzled by the rapid spread of Socialism in his realm. The recent elections to the Reichstag showed large Socialist gains at the expense of both the leading parties, and he has just been advised by a trusted staff officer that Saxony is honeycombed with Socialism. Emperor William remarked that he could not understand why his Saxon subjects should be discontented, but "he greatly feared that the ardent anxiety for the welfare of the German people which was always uppermost in his thoughts was either insufficiently known or else the agitators maliciously threw dust into the eyes of their dupes, thus blinding them to the true road to national prosperity." The behavior of these ungrateful Saxons, comments the New York Times of recent date, is certainly most unaccountable. They hav the most amiable emperor in the world, and a kind old man as chancellor, and all that this indulgent pair ask of the German subject is that he shall serve seven years in the standing army and five years more in the Landwehr, and then dig and sweat and be taxed the remainder of his natural life in order that the old emperor may every year indulge his liking for seeing half a million soldiers go through their autumn manœuvers. A German subject who would deprive his Kaiser of rational amusement on the selfish and frivolous pretext that the money wrung from him in taxes would keep his wife and family in food and firewood must be a very hard-hearted person.

THE lighthouse keeper at Reykjanes, the southwest point of Iceland, discovered on July 29th last that a new island had suddenly appeared above the water, about nine miles from the mainland. Nine weeks ago the British consul in Iceland visited the island, which he describes as a black volcanic rock of small extent. In this neighborhood several islands hav from time to time risen to the surface or sunk out of sight. Geological writings giv a great many instances of important changes on the earth's surface that hav been made within historical times. The stupendous volcanic eruption of Krakatau on Aug. 27th, last year, entirely changed the physical aspect of the Sunda Straits. A part of Krakatau was shot out of the sea and dropped into the straits eight miles northward. The greater portion of the island, containing several thousand million cubic yards of earth, was hurled through the air over Zaug Island, and plunged into the channel seven miles to the northeast. These two new pieces of land, which hav been named Steers and Calmeyer Islands, now appear above the sea where previously 240 feet of water existed. Where the volcano of Krakatau stood a sea fathomless by a line of 1,000 feet now exists. General Sir J. H. Lefroy recently called attention to the fact that ninety-six more or less extensiv tracts of land are known to be rising or sinking. Geologists tell us that the Atlantic coast between Cape Cod and Cape Hatteras has been sinking for centuries, and that the subsidence has not yet ceased on the coasts of New York and New Jersey. The Indians who lived on Manhattan Island when the Dutch colonized it two centuries ago, said that in the time of their great-grandfathers it was possible to cross Hell Gate dry shod from one bank to the other. Professor Guyot estimated that since the colonization of the country, this part of the coast has subsided twenty-three and one-half inches every century. Science is not yet able to tell in accordance with what laws these upheavals and depressions of the earth's crust occur. Geologists, however, hav been able to fix almost exactly the limits of the areas both of upheaval and subsidence. There is now no doubt that many of the islands of the southern Pacific Ocean are the lofty portions of a continent which sank until the waters covered it. Other parts of the Pacific Ocean bed are gradually rising, and are thrusting here and there new islands above the sea. While the greater part of the American continent is slowly rising, Australia is gradually sinking. Lieutenant-Commander De Long found evidence that Bennett Island had risen one hundred feet within quite recent times. Thus year by year the earth is reconstituting its seas and continents.

News of the Week.

THE year 1884 givs an aggregate loss by fire in the United States and Canada of about $110,000,000.

ONE thousand persons are on strike at South Norwalk, Conn., against a reduction of wages in the hat factories.

THE chief of police at Waverly, N. Y., was mistaken for a burglar by a brother policeman, last Sunday, and shot accordingly.

NEW YORK city has more than 14,000 employees, who are paid about one million per month out of the municipal treasury.

THE Plenary Council of Catholic dignitaries at Baltimore closed on the 7th. The Methodists are about to hold a centenary celebration at the same place.

AN accidental explosion of dynamite in a farmhouse at Strafford, N. H., last week, injured eight persons, six of them, it is thought, fatally.

IT having been proposed that Congress should pay Gen. Grant an annual pension of $5,000, the general announces that he will not accept the annuity.

FRANCIS D. MOULTON died on the 3d inst., aged 49. He was the principal witness in the Beecher-Tilton scandal, in which he became famous as the "mutual friend."

DEACON TERRY, of Riverhead, L. I., ran away from home last week, taking Mrs. Downs, his pastor's wife, with him. He took $4,000 in money, but deeded his farm to his wife.

A NUMBER of eminent pugilists gave an exhibition in this city last week for the benefit of the striking miners in Hocking Valley, Ohio. More than two thousand dollars was realized.

REPRESENTATIV MILLARD, of New York, will introduce in Congress a proposed constitutional amendment making the president's term six years and providing that he shall be ineligible to re-election. A pension, the amount of which is to be fixed hereafter, is to be paid to ex-presidents.

THE Rev. James Ross was arrested at Middlefield, Ohio, on the 3d for forgery. Ross, with his family, consisting of a wife and two small children, came to Middlefield about the first of last May. No one knew who he was or where he was from. During his residence there, part of his time has been spent in preaching, and the remainder at the joiner's trade. It seems that Ross had been living in Flint about two years previous to last May, and was pastor of one of the churches there. In the latter part of April, it is charged, he forged a note for $100 on a farmer in Flint, cashed it, and left the town.

THE Washington Monument at the national capital was completed last Saturday afternoon by setting in place the marble capstone. There was no special celebration, that being reserved for Washington's Birthday. A flag over the monument floats from a flagstaff the top of which is exactly 600 feet from the ground, thus displaying the American colors at the greatest hight of construction ever yet known in the world. The monument itself, with its total hight of 550 feet, far overtops every other structure of human hands. The aluminium apex of the monument is engraved with inscriptions as follows: On one face: "Chief Engineer and Architect, Thomas Lincoln Casey, Colonel Corps of Engineers; Assistants, George W. Davis, Fourteenth United States Infantry; Bernard R. Green, civil engineer; Master Mechanic, P. H. McLaughlin." On another: "Cornerstone laid on bed of foundation July 4, 1848. First stone, at hight of 152 feet, laid Aug. 7, 1880. Capstone set Dec. 6, 1884." On a third: "Joint Commission at setting of capstone: Chester A. Arthur, W. W. Corcoran, chairman; M. E. Bell, Edward Clark, John Newton. Act of Aug. 2, 1876." On the fourth side some religious gentleman got in his work by having "Laus Deo" (praise to God) engraved. Thanks to this individual, our patriotism and our superstition go upon record at the same altitude.

Bacon and Shakspere.

A CHRONOGRAPHIC PARALLEL.

Born Jan. 22, 1561; died Apr. 9, 1626; aged 65 years.	Born Apr. 23, 1564; died Apr. 23, 1616; aged 52 years.
Son of a Lord Keeper of England, a learned Protestant.	Son of a wool stapler and glover of Stratford, an illiterate Catholic.
Left college at 15, a graduate.	Left school at 14—perhaps.
Went as an attache to the Court of Paris, from 15 to 18.	Worked with his father at a trade until 18, or longer.
Learned French, Italian, and Spanish.	Drank beer at pot-houses—probably.
Returned on the death of his father, bearing a dispatch to the Queen.	Hunted conies and poached on neighboring deer-parks.
Married at 45 to a handsome young maiden of rank. "Then let thy love be younger than thyself, Or thy affection cannot hold the bent." —Twelfth Night, ii., 4.	Married at 18 (name Shagspere) to a girl of 26. "His works are full of passages . . . which, if he had loved and honored her, he could not have written. —White's Shak., p. 51.
Had no child after 20 years' marriage. "The noblest works and foundations hav proceeded from childless men."—Bacon's Essays, 1597.	Child born five months after marriage— "The less that is said about the matter the better." —White's Shak., p. 49.
Admitted to the bar at 21; elected to Parliament at 23.	Absconded from Stratford to London at 22 or 23.

Bearing in mind that Bacon is three years and three months older than Shakspere, we will now parallel their lives by successiv years, beginning with 1585.

A.D. 1585.

Bacon at 24, in a letter to the Queen's principal secretary, Sir Francis Walsingham, urges his sometime pending suit, which is to determin his "course of practice"—supposed to mean a shortening of the five years' probation required to become a pleader.

His mother in her zeal for the Nonconformists urges their cause in person before Lord Treasurer Burleigh, and follows it by a letter to the same in which she says:

"I confess as one that hath found mercy, that I hav profited more in the inward feeling knowledge of God his holy will, though but in small measure, by an ordinary preaching within these seven or eight years, than I did by hearing odd sermons at Paul's well nigh twenty years together."

Shakspere at 21 is still living at Stratford. His father is said to hav been a butcher as well as a dealer in wool; and gossiping John Aubrey says he was told by some of the neighbors that when the boy William "kill'd a calfe, he wold doe it in a high style, and make a speeche."

Mr. Richard Grant White guesses that William may hav gone to London this year, 1585, or the next.

A.D. 1586.

Bacon at 25 writes a letter, May 6th, to Lord Treasurer Burleigh, his uncle, saying:

"I find in my simple observation that they which liv as it were in umbra and not in public or frequent action, how moderately and modestly soever they behave themselvs, yet laborant invidia. I find also that such persons as are of nature bashful (as myself is), whereby they want that plausible familiarity which others hav, are often mistaken for proud. But once I know well, and I most humbly beseech your Lordship to believe that arrogancy and overweening is so far from my nature, as, if I think well of myself in anything, it is in this, that I am free from that vice."

He is again elected to Parliament. The conspirators who attempted to liberate Mary of Scotland hav been tried, condemned, aud sentenced. The case is brought before the Parliament. Bacon is one of the speakers in "the Great Cause," and one of the committees to whom it is referred.

Shakspere at 22 is probably still at Stratford, though Mr. White presumes he has become connected with the London stage during the year 1586, or perhaps a little later.

A.D. 1587.

Bacon at 26 has become a Bencher, i. e., an inner barrister, with liberty to plead in the courts of Westminister.

The Parliamentary Journal of February 23d contains this entry:

"The committees appointed for conference touching a loan or benevolence to be offered to her majesty are Mr. Francis Bacon, Mr. Edward Lewkenor, and others."

At the Christmas Revels Bacon assists the gentlemen of Gray's Inn in getting up the performances. A comedy, in which Cataline and "Dominus de Purpoole" are the leading characters ("Prince Purpoole" in 1594), is exhibited by the gentlemen of the Inn at their Hall, before Lord Burleigh and other courtiers on the 16th of January.

Shakspere at twenty-three has probably migrated to London, leaving his family at Stratford, but it is not certain that he is connected with the theater. Some say he held horses at the entrance.

For several years prior to this time different theatrical companies hav occasionally visited Stratford (the nativ place of some of the actors), in some instances under the patronage, it is said, of John Shakspere and other aldermen.

A.D. 1588.

Bacon at twenty-seven assists in getting up a masque, which is presented to the queen by the gentlemen of Gray's Inn on the 28th of February. This is all the biographer Mr. James Spedding can find to record about Bacon from the adjournment of Parliament, March 23, 1587, until after the defeat of the Spanish Armada, July 20, 1588. The exhibition before the queen seems to be a continuation of the Christmas festivities. On the 16th of January a comedy ("Cataline and Dominus de Purpoole") is performed at Gray's Inn before Lord Burleigh, and on the 28th of February the queen is entertained at Greenwich by an exhibition of the tragedy of "The Misfortunes of Arthur," together with certain masques, for which Bacon writes at least some "additional speeches," and otherwise renders assistance.

A letter from Bacon to the earl of Leicester, asking for his furtherance of some suit which the earl of Essex had moved in his behalf, has recently been found, written in this year (Spedding's "Bacon," 1878, i, 50, note). The attachment of Bacon to Essex therefore began as early as 1588, instead of 1590.

Elizabeth summons a new Parliament to meet in November, but it does not meet for business until the 4th of February following. Bacon sits in this Parliament for Liverpool.

Shakspere at twenty-four is in London, and perhaps employed at the theater "as a servitor," or "in a very mean rank." The story that he held horses at the play-house door, Mr. White says, "was not heard of until the middle of the last century, and is unworthy of serious attention." But whatever his position, plays hav certainly been performed which are afterwards fathered by him, who in 1588, and perhaps up to 1590, is not suspected to be the author of anything. One of these is probably the first sketch of the second part of "Henry VI.," printed in 1594 under the title of "The First Part of the Contention of the Two Houses of York and Lancaster," and another, printed in 1595, entitled, "The True Tragedy of Richard, Duke of York," both without the name of the author. The play called "The Famous Victories of Henry V." has been acted on the stage, prior to 1588, and seems to hav grown into First and Second "Henry IV." and "Henry V."

A.D. 1589.

Bacon at twenty-eight is a reader at Gray's Inn, and has acquired an ascendancy as an orator in the House of Commons. On the question of granting a double subsidy to the queen, his name stands foremost on the Journals. He is "one of the committees for that purpose," and is instructed to meet and confer with her majesty's counsel who are charged with the preparation of the bill.

The Puritans are forbidden to hav open preaching. The licensed press is closed to their writings. They hav recourse to secret movable printing-presses, and scatter anonymous publications all over the land. In all these strifes Bacon counsels moderation and prudence, aiming at harmony and tolerance.

He receives a "a grant of the office of the clerk of the counsel in the Star Chamber," procured by Lord Burleigh, but it is only a reversion, which does not fall in for nearly twenty years, when it is considered worth £2,000 a year.

He writes an "Advertisment Touching the Controversies of the Church of England," apparently for circulation in manuscript. It is not printed until 1640.

He drafts for Secretary Walsingham (father of the widow Sidney, who is married in the following year to the earl of Essex) a letter on the conduct of the government toward Papists and Dissenters, which is addressed to Monsieur Critoy, secretary of France. The greater part of this letter is found almost verbatim in Bacon's "Observations on a Libel," written in 1592.

Shakspere at twenty-five, if Mr. Collins's discovery in 1835 is to be trusted, has become one of sixteen owners of the Blackfriars' Theater. The first theater erected in modern times was in London in 1575. Prior to that time public acting was mostly out of doors, and players were fined, imprisoned, and even put in the stocks. The erection of the Blackfriars was an offense to the nobility of that aristocratic neighborhood, now the heart of London. The players were under the protection and patronage of the queen's favorit, the earl of Leicester, who died in 1588. He was stepfather to the earl of Essex. Lord Chamberlain Hunsdon became the next patron of the company.

"Titus Andronicus" has appeared by this year, and commissioners are appointed by the queen to revise stage plays.

ANTIQUARY.

Jonathan Edwards: His Notion of the Final State of the Lost.

The appended extracts from the writings of Jonathan Edwards are found in Vol. IV. of the works of that eminent author. Edwards was a Connecticut Yankee, born at East Windsor, Oct. 5, 1703. At the age of seventeen he was "converted," and thereafter devoted his life to teaching the genial doctrins of total depravity and eternal damnation. He died March 22, 1758. Following are some of his most comforting assurances:

"Impenitent sinners will not be able to find any to befriend them and intercede with God for them. They had the offer of a mediator often made them in this world; but they will hav no offers of such a nature in hell. None will befriend them. They will hav no friend in hell; all there will be their enemies. They will hav no friend in heaven; none of the saints or angels will befriend them; or if they should, it would be to no purpose. There will be no creature that will hav any power to deliver them, nor will any even pity them.

"Nor will they ever be able to make their escape. They will find no means to break prison and flee. In hell they will be reserved in chains and darkness for ever and ever. Malefactors hav often found means to break prison, and escape the hand of civil justice. But none ever escaped out of the prison of hell, which is God's prison. It is a strong prison; it is beyond any finite power, or the united strength of all wicked men and devils to unlock or break open the door of that prison. Christ hath the key of hell; 'he shuts, and no man opens.'

"Nor will they ever be able to find anything to relieve them in hell. They will never find any resting-place there; any place of respit; any secret corner, which will be cooler than the rest, where they may hav a little respit, a small abatement of the extremity of their torment. They never will be able to find any cooling stream or fountain in any part of that world of torment; no, nor so much as a drop of water to cool their tongues. They will find no company to giv them any comfort, or to do them the least good. They will find no place where they can remain, and rest, and take breath for one minute; for they will be tormented with fire and brimstone; and will hav no rest day nor night forever and ever" (pages 268, 269).

"We can conceive but little of the matter; we can not conceive what that sinking of the soul in such case is. But to help your conception, imagin yourself to be cast into a fiery oven, all of a glowing heat, or into the midst of a glowing brick-kiln, or of a great furnace, where your pain would be as much greater than that occasioned by accidentally touching a coal of fire as the heat is greater. Imagin also that your body were to lie there for a quarter of an hour, full of fire, as full within and without as a bright coal of fire, all the while full of quick sense; what horror would you feel at the entrance of such a furnace! And how long would that quarter of an hour seem to you! If it were to be measured by a glass, how long would the glass seem to be running! And after you had endured it for one minute, how overbearing would it be to you to think that you had it to endure the other fourteen! But what would be the effect on your soul, if you knew you must lie there enduring that torment to the full for twenty-four hours! And how much greater would be the effect, if you knew you must endure it for a whole year! And how vastly greater still if you knew you must endure it for a thousand years! Oh, then, how would your heart sink if you thought, if you knew, that you must bear it forever and ever! That there would be no end! That after millions of millions of ages your torment would be no nearer to an end than ever it was; and that you never, never should be delivered!

"But your torment in hell will be immensely greater than this illustration represents. How, then, will the heart of a poor creature sink under it! How utterly inexpressible and inconceivable must the sinking of the soul be in such a case!

"Whoever thou art, whether old or young, little or great, if thou art in a Christless, unconverted state, this is the wrath, this is the death, to which thou art condemned. This is the wrath that abideth on thee; this is the hell over which thou hangest, and into which thou art ready to drop every day and every night" (pages 260, 261).

"It will not be long before you will be wonderfully changed. You who now hear of hell and the wrath of the great God, and sit here in these seats so easy and quiet, and go away so careless, by and by will shake, and tremble, and cry out, and shriek, and gnash your teeth, and will be thoroughly convinced of the vast weight and importance of these great things which you now despise. You will not then need to hear sermons in order to make you sensible; you will be at a sufficient distance from slighting that wrath and power of God of which you now hear with so much quietness and indifference" (page 265).

"Be entreated to consider attentivly how great and awful a thing eternity is. Although you cannot comprehend it the more by considering, yet you may be made more sensible that it is not a thing to be disregarded. Do but consider what it is to suffer extreme torment forever and ever; to suffer it day and night from one day to another, from one year to another, from one age to another, from one thousand ages to another, and so adding age to age and thousands to thousands, in pain, in wailing and lamenting, groaning and shrieking, and gnashing your teeth; with your souls full of dreadful grief and amazement, with your bodies and every member full of racking torture, without any possibility of getting ease; without any possibility of moving God to pity by your cries; without any possibility of hiding yourself from him; without any possibility of diverting your thoughts from your pain; without any possibility of obtaining any manner of mitigation, or help, or change for the better any way.

"Do but consider how dreadful despair will be in such torment. How dismal will it be when you are under these racking torments to know assuredly that you never, never shall be delivered from them; to hav no hope! When you shall wish that you might be turned into nothing, but shall hav no hope of it; when you shall wish that you might be turned into a toad or a serpent, but shall hav no hope of it; when you would rejoice if you might but hav any relief, after you shall hav endured these torments millions of ages, but shall hav no hope of it; when, after you shall hav worn out the age of the sun, moon, and stars in your dolorous groans and lamentations, without any rest day or night, or one minute's ease, yet you shall hav no hope of ever being delivered; when, after you shall hav worn out a thousand more such ages, yet you shall hav no hope, but shall know that you are not one whit nearer to the end of your torments; but that still there are the same groans, the same shrieks, the same doleful cries, incessantly to be made by you, and that the smoke of your torment shall still ascend up forever and ever; and that your souls which shall hav been agitated with the wrath of God all this while yet will still exist to bear more wrath; your bodies which shall hav been burning and roasting all this while in these glowing flames yet shall not hav been consumed, but will remain to roast through an eternity yet, which will not hav been at all shortened by what shall hav been past.

"You may by considering make yourselvs more sensible than you ordinarily are; but it is a little you can conceive of what it is to hav no hope in such torments" (page 278).

"At the day of judgment, the saints in glory at Christ's right hand will see the wicked at the left hand in their amazement and horror; will hear the judge pronounce sentence upon them, saying, 'Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels,' and will see them go away into everlasting punishment. But the scripture seems to hold forth to us that the saints will not only see the misery of the wicked at the day of judgment, but the state of the damned in hell will be in the view of the heavenly inhabitants; that the two worlds of happiness and misery will be in view of each other. Though we know not by what means nor after what manner it will be, yet the scriptures certainly lead us to think that they will some way or other hav a direct and immediate apprehension of each other's state. The saints in glory will see how the damned are tormented; they will see God's threatenings fulfilled, and his wrath executed upon them. When they shall see it, it will be no occasion of grief to them. The miseries of the damned in hell will be inconceivably great. When they shall come to bear the wrath of the almighty poured out upon them without mixture, and executed upon them without pity or restraint or any mitigation, it will doubtless cause anguish, and horror, and amazement vastly beyond all the sufferings and torments that ever any man endured in this world, yea, beyond all extent of our words or thoughts. For God in executing wrath upon ungodly men will act like an almighty God. The scripture calls this wrath, God's fury, and the fierceness of his wrath; and we are told that this is to show God's wrath, and to make his power known; or to make known how dreadful his wrath is, and how great his power.

"The saints in glory will see this, and be far more sensible of it than now we can possibly be. They will be far more sensible how dreadful the wrath of God is, and will better understand how terrible the sufferings of the damned are; yet this will be no occasion of grief to them. They will not be sorry for the damned; it will cause no uneasiness or dissatisfaction to them; but on the contrary, when they hav this sight it will excite them to joyful praises" (pages 289, 290).

"Positivly, the sufferings of the damned will be no occasion of grief to the heavenly inhabitants, as they will hav no love nor pity to the damned as such. They will rejoice in seeing the justice of God glorified in the sufferings of the damned" (page 29).

THE UNGODLY WARNED.—"How destitute of any comforting consideration your condition will be if you perish at last. You will hav none to pity you. Look which way you will, before or behind, on the right hand or left, look up to heaven, or look about you in hell, and you will see none to condole your case, or to exercise any pity toward you in your dreadful condition. You must bear these flames, you must bear that torment and amazement day and night forever, and never hav the comfort of considering that there is so much as one that pities your case; there never will be one tear dropped for you.

"You will find none that will pity you in hell. The devils will not pity you, but will be your tormentors, as roaring lions or hell-hounds, to tear you in pieces continually. And other wicked men who shall be there will be like devils; they will hav no pity on you, but will hate and curse and torment you. And you yourselvs will be like devils; you will be like devils to yourselvs, and will be your own tormentors" (page 295).

"When you shall stand before the tribunal at the left hand, among devils, trembling and astonished, and shall hav the dreadful sentence passed upon you, you will at the same time see the blessed company of saints and angels at the right hand rejoicing, and shall hear them shout forth praises of God, while they hear your sentence pronounced. You will then see those godly people with whom you shall hav been acquainted and who shall hav been your neighbors, and with whom you now often converse, rejoicing at the pronunciation and execution of your sentence.

"You that hav godly parents, who in this world hav tenderly loved you, who were wont to look upon your welfare as their own, and were wont to be grieved when anything calamitous befell you in this word, and especially were greatly concerned for the good of your souls, industriously sought and earnestly prayed for their salvation; how will you bear to see them in the kingdom of God, crowned with glory?

"You will then see them praising God for executing just vengeance on you for setting so light by their councils and reproofs. However here they loved you and were concerned for you, now they will rise up in judgment against you, and will declare how your sins are aggravated by the endeavors which they to no purpose used with you to bring you to forsake sin and practice virtue, and to seek and serve God; but you were obstinate under all, and would not hearken to them. They will declare how inexcusable you are upon this account. And when the Judge shall execute the more terrible wrath upon you upon this account, that you hav made no better improvement of your parents' instructions, they will joyfully praise God for it.

"After they shall hav seen you lie in hell thousands of years, and your torment shall yet continne without any rest, day or night, they will not begin to pity you then; they will praise God that his justice appears in the eternity of your misery.

"You that hav godly husbands, or wives, or brethren, or sisters, with whom you hav been wont to dwell under the same roof and eat at the same table, consider how it will be with you when you shall come to part with them, when they shall be taken and you left.

"However you may wail and lament when you see them parted from you, they being taken and you left, you will see in them no signs of sorrow that you are not taken with them" (pages 396, 297).

"If you continue not to bring forth any fruit to divine glory, as you hav hitherto done, hell will be the only fit place for you. It is a place prepared on purpose to be a receptacle of such persons. In hell nature ceases to labor any more for sinners; the sun does not run his course to shine upon them; the earth doth not bring forth her fruits to be consumed upon them there. There they will hav no opportunity to consume the fruits of divine goodness on their lusts. In hell they can prejudice or encumber nothing upon which God sets any value. There the faithful servants and ministers of God will no longer spend their strength in vain upon them. When the barren tree is in the fire, the servants of the husbandman are free from any further toil in digging about it and manuring it.

"In hell they will no more hav opportunity to clog and discourage the flourishing of religion, and to destroy much good, as they often do in this world. In hell they will no more hav opportunity to corrupt others by their ill example.

"In hell they will no more hav it in their power to offend the godly. They may hurt and torment one another, but the godly will be out of their reach. In hell there will be no ordinances, no Sabbaths, no sacraments, no sacred things for them to profane and defile by their careless and hypocritical attendance.

"Hell, therefore, if you remain unfruitful and cumberers of the ground, will be the fittest place for you, and there you will surely hav your portion assigned you" (page 312).

"God has laid himself under no obligation by any promis to keep any natural man out of hell one moment. . . . Natural men are held in the hand of God over the pit of hell; they hav deserved the fiery pit and are already sentenced to it. And God is dreadfully provoked; his anger is as great toward them as to those that are actually suffering the executions of the fierceness of his wrath in hell, and they hav done nothing in the least to appease or abate that anger. Neither is God in the least bound by any promis to hold them up one moment; the devil is waiting for them, hell is gaping for them, the flames gather and flash about them, and would fain lay hold on them and swallow them up" (page 316).

"The God that holds you over the pit of hell, much as one holds a spider or some loathsome insect over the fire, abhors you, and is dreadfully provoked; his wrath towards you burns like fire; he looks upon you as worthy of nothing else but to be cast into the fire; he is of purer eyes than to bear to hav you in his sight; you are ten thousand times so abominable in his eyes as the most hateful and venomous serpent is in ours. You hav offended him infinitly more than ever a stubborn rebel did his prince; and yet it is nothing but his hand that holds you from falling into the fire every moment; it is ascribed to nothing else that you did not go to hell the last night; that you was suffered to awake again in this world after you closed your eyes to sleep; and there is no other reason to be given why you hav not dropped into hell since you arose in the morning, but that God's hand held you up; there is no other reason to be given why you hav not gone to hell since you hav sat here in the house of God, provoking his pure eyes by your sinful, wicked manner of attending his solemn worship; yea, there is nothing else that is to be given as a reason why you do not at this very moment drop down into hell" (page 318).

"The misery of the damned in hell can be better represented by nothing than by a deluge of misery, a mighty deluge of wrath which will be ten thousand times worse than a deluge of waters; for it will be a deluge of liquid fire, as in the scriptures it is called a lake of fire and brimstone. At the end of the world all the wicked shall be swallowed up in a vast deluge of fire which shall be as great and as mighty as Noah's deluge of water.

"After that the wicked will hav mighty billows of fire and brimstone eternally rolling over their poor souls, and their miserable, tormented bodies Those billows may be called vast liquid mountains of fire and brimstone. And when one billow shall hav gone over their heads, another shall follow, without intermission, giving them no rest day nor night to all eternity" (page 379).

"Men can artificially raise such a degree of heat with burning-glasses as will quickly melt the very stones and sand. And it is probable that the heat of that great fire which will burn the world will be such as to melt the rocks and very ground, and turn them into a kind of liquid fire. So that the whole world will probably be converted into a great lake, or liquid globe of fire, a vast ocean of fire in which the wicked shall be overwhelmed. It will be an ocean of fire which will always be in a tempest, in which the wicked shall be tossed to and fro, having no rest day nor night, vast waves or billows of fire continually rolling over their heads.

"They shall know that they shall forever be full of quick sense within and without; their heads, their eyes, their tongues, their hands, their feet, their loins, and their vitals shall forever be full of glowing, melting fire, fierce enough to melt the very rocks and elements; and also that they shall eternally be full of the most quick and lively sense to feel the torment" (page 495).

A Trusting Girl and a Christian Woman.

A TRUE STORY.

The good Christian woman! How often we hear of her virtues! A practical example of them came under my view lately. She is the wife of a wealthy farmer, and the mother of a handsome son. The son paid attentions to a neighbor's motherless daughter. The good Christian mother learned that the girl was approaching motherhood, and her handsome son, who was the father of the prospectiv child, intended in good faith to carry out his promis, and marry the girl before the birth of the child. Thereupon the good Christian mother compelled her handsome son to abscond without a word of warning or farewell. When the news was brought to the girl, she was sewing on her wedding clothes, and she got up and started to a pond to drown herself, saying not a word to any one.

The matter was compromised; another man married the girl and fathered the child, receiving a sum of money for its benefit. He was a very distant collateral kinsman of the girl's, and married her because he wanted to save her from further disgrace and from sinking into hopeless ruin. They moved to a distant community. It was not pretended that the girl was not pure save for her confidence in her lover, the first and only lover she ever had. But her "social position" lacked about one per cent of being as good as his in the imagination of his mother.

The girl is broken-hearted and is dragging out a miserable existence; her brother is drinking himself to death; her old lover and betrayer is a prey to remorse; but the good Christian woman who caused the ruin is all right—for Christ has forgiven her and washed away her crime "in his own precious blood." Brethren, let us pray.

The Liberal Club.

When a visitor last Friday evening trudged up the steps leading to the hall where the Manhattan Liberal Club holds its meetings, he found Librarian King standing at the top conversing with the Hindoo pundit who sets type on THE TRUTH SEEKER. In answer to a question, Mr. King said that a man they called Brick Pomeroy was inside talking on the greenback dollar and its power to promote general prosperity. He didn't know who Brick Pomeroy was, and he guessed he wouldn't stay. Subsequent events showed that the librarian had missed a good meeting. When the visitor gained access to the hall, Mr. Pomeroy was well under way on his lecture, which was nearly identical with the one delivered before the club about a year ago. His proposition was to do away with national bank notes and to issue greenbacks in sufficient quantities to pay the bonded debt of the nation, as well as to remunerate the president and other public servants. He believed that, as the aforesaid bonds had already been paid in interest, it would be no injustice to the holders if they were paid in greenbacks and the debt repudiated. It was true there was a contract that the bonds should bear interest until the year of grace 1900 and odd, but the government might repudiate that contract, and the individual had no more right to protest than the sinner had to kick against the judgments of Almighty God. Mr. Pomeroy would hav the government put out one hundred millions of greenbacks yearly for two years as an experiment. Prosperity would come paying its way with the greenback dollar.

At the conclusion of the address, Mr. Wakeman spoke of the persecution of Charles Conroy by Anthony Comstock. The Defense Association had decided that Conroy was innocent of the misdemeanor charged against him, and should be defended. The Defense Committee were competent judges in that matter, as the deponent was informed and believed, and those wishing to contribute to the end in view should confer with Dr. Foote. The able and interesting lecture to which we had listened was now open to discussion.

Mr. Huhn urged upon Mr. Sutherland, there present, to expose the fallacies of Brother Pomeroy. Mr. Sutherland wished for space to collect his thoughts.

Mr. Slensby said that his good sense told him to sit still, but his emotions got the best of his sense and he would offer a few remarks. In the first place, Mr. Pomeroy had informed us that he was always in debt. Mr. Slensby did not think a man who was always in debt was the person most eminently qualified to instruct the members of the club on the subject of finance. If the government was to break its contract as to the bonds it had issued, what guarantee had we that it would keep its word as to greenbacks?

Mr. Blissert observed that Mr. Slensby's was the funniest argument he ever heard in his life. He corrected Mr. Slensby's pronunciation of the word finance, which that gentleman had pronounced fi-nance. Mr. Blissert, who is an Irishman, gave the authorized orthoëpy of the word as "foi-narnce."

Mr. Sutherland claimed that Mr. Pomeroy's method of getting the government out of debt by setting a printing-press to running and turning out greenback money was novel but impracticable, as a paper dollar was a mere I. O. U. of no value unless it was subject to redemption. As for Mr. Pomeroy's statements, they were woefully inaccurate. The speaker would like to be informed what constituted a dollar—certainly not a piece of paper bearing a promis to pay. Mr. Pomeroy's scheme would not do. During the remarks of this speaker, which lacked continuity on account of being extemporaneous, the people in the rear of the hall dropped into light and versatil verbal intercourse. Order was restored, however, by a timely suggestion from the chair that the conversation be temporarily suspended while Mr. Sutherland was addressing the club. This happy result having been attained, the orator's discourse wore on to the end of twenty minutes.

Mr. Huhn volunteered to tell Mr. Sutherland what constituted a dollar. In the first place, it was one hundred cents. In the second place, it was the unit of value in the United States, as a pound was the unit of value in England, and a franc in France. "That," said Mr. Huhn, "is my conception of a dollar." His plan for getting the government out of debt was to pay off in greenbacks the bonds that had been issued, and to hang the first man that should ever suggest the issuing of another.

Mr. Leavitt regretted that he had left his figures at home, but in default of these the best contribution he could make to the subject of money would be a history of the national finances from the beginning of the war up to the present time. As the hour was late, this design of Mr. Leavitt's was generally deprecated by the audience, but he proceeded, and had got so far as 1873 when his time expired and the chairman drove his nail in.

Mr. Pomeroy, in replying, said he had made no statements which were not strictly accurate, and which could not be verified by official figures. The government should never borrow a dollar while it had the power of creating money. As well, said he, might the Almighty borrow candles of the devil while possessing the ability to make suns and stars.

The club adjourned at the usual time under the belief that it had been a grand meeting, though the feeling engendered by the absence of Mr. Shook assumed the intensity of a poignant regret. At the next session Mr. Cohen will reconsider the vote for Gen. Butler in the late presidential election.

Canadian Notes.

Last evening a lecture was delivered by Mr. J. A. Risser in Albert Hall, on the subject, "Freethinking a Duty." He showed the variety of ways in which people put out their thinking to be done for them by somebody else instead of doing their own thinking. Others again performed all their mental work in conformity to some rule or plan or authority, or sets of creeds or dogmas or books. The votaries of superstitious theology got their priests to think for them. Other religious bigots never venture to think at all before they hav first consulted a book (which they call sacred), and then they dare not think except in accordance with the teachings of the book.

Taylor says, in contemplating the origin of Christianity, we hav to consider that as the sources from which all men's ideas are derived are the same, namely, from the five senses (the only means of acquiring knowledge) there is nothing wonderful in the general prevalence of a sameness of ideas in humanity in all regions of the world and in all ages. The affections of grief, fear, pain, hope, pleasure, gratitude, etc., are as common to man as his nature as a man, and could not fail to produce a corresponding similarity in the objects of his superstitious veneration. The idea of the atonement, of a sacrificed Christ, savior of men, who offered himself to die in order to save us from punishment for our sins (the savior himself being without sin, and heaven-born by means of an immaculate conception), this Christ to hav lived and died as no other could liv and die, to hav done and suffered great things for the service of mankind, but above all to hav propitiated the wrath of the supreme being—and to hav conquered the invisible authors of mischief in man's behalf—was such an overwhelming draft on man's tender feelings (the excitement of which is one of the strongest sources of pleasure in our nature) that the best hearts, and the weakest heads, never gave place to the coolness and apathy of skepticism.

The articles in the Toronto Daily Mail on the decline of Christianity and the universal and overwhelming growth of Secularism hav attracted much attention in all parts of Canada. But the Toronto Daily Mail is only one among many newspapers throughout the dominion which say the same thing. It is pleasing to find that many of the Canadian provincial press are edited by no mere ignorant Christians, but by well read, thoughtful, and cultured persons, which can be seen in the excellence of their literary work.

When the story of Jesus of Nazareth (the Christ) was preached to the nations of the ancient world (they having already similar Christs of their own), they never entertained a doubt that a similar series of adventures was proof of one and the same hero, and that the Grecian Apollo, Phœnician Adonis, the Esculapius of Athens, the Osiris of Egypt, the Christna of India, and the Jesus Christ of Nazareth were but various names of the self-same deity. So that nothing was so easy at any time as the business of conversion. Not skepticism, but superstitious credulity, is the characteristic propensity of mankind.

Mr. Moody is holding revival meetings in Toronto. The Toronto Daily World has an article upon him with headlines in staring black type, "Mr. Moody Makes it Pay," "The Revivalist's Mansions—his Wealth and his Trotters." After an account of his success and his lack of intellectual acquirements, the World continues: "How can we explain this phenomenon? Perhaps it is useless to attempt it in these days of religious surprises, of Salvation Armies, and the like. Mr. Moody has none of the graces of oratory, his voice is harsh and unmusical, and there is no depth or originality in what he says. The discourse is made up of the usual revivalist talk, with a large admixture of anecdotes, comic stories, and Yankee slang uttered through the nose, which he delivers himself of with astounding glibness in the most approved New England auctioneer style.

A disposition to multiply the objects of faith—to listen with eagerness to anything that is offered to them as miraculous, to believe every pretense to a divine revelation, to embrace every creed—presents itself in the history of almost every society of mankind, and is found to be nearly a universal characteristic of human nature. Unbelief is no sin that ignorance was ever capable of being guilty of. To suspect it of the nations previous to the Christian era is to outrage all inferences of our experience, and to suppose the human race in former times to hav been a different species of animal from any of which the wonder loving and credulous vulgar of our own day would be the descendants. Of all miracles that could possibly be imagined, the miracle of a miracle not believed would be the most miraculous.

Probably the catching airs of Sankey hav had quite as much to do with the remarkable success of those evangelists as Moody's exhortations (they can not be called sermons). The officially published biography of Mr. Moody states that the two evangelists started their work with the determination "to take no salaries in any form, to ask no collections, to engage in no business, but to devote themselvs solely to the work of God, and to rely upon him for all things requisit and necessary as well for the body as for the soul," and it adds in a foot-note that in his visit to Toronto Mr. Moody has not hinted at the question of remuneration. Yet a good many people will be surprised to learn that Mr. Moody started as an evangelist poor, and is now very wealthy.

The miraculous darkness which covered the whole earth for the space of six hours, which the evangelists so solemnly declare to hav attended the crucifixion of Christ, labors under the fatality of an absolute and total want of evidence. In the "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," Gibbon, in his usual strain of sarcasm and irony, keenly asks, "How shall we excuse the supine inattention of the pagan and philosophic world to those evidences that were presented by the hand of omnipotent God, of the truths Christianity presented not to their reason only but to their senses. This miraculous event, which ought to hav excited the wonder, the curiosity, and the devotion of mankind, passed without the slightest notice in an age of philosophy of science and of history during the golden age of Roman literature contemporary with a multitude of busy pens. It happened during the lifetime of Seneca and the elder Pliny, who must hav experienced the effects or received the earliest intelligence of the prodigy. One of these philosophers in a laborious work has recorded all the great phenomena of nature that had ever happened, so far as known or recorded—earthquakes, meteors, comets, etc., all that his indefatigable curiosity and industry could collect—but both he and the other hav entirely omitted to mention the greatest phenomena, the most astounding occurrences in physical nature to which the mortal eye has ever been witness since the creation of the globe" (Vol. ii, chap. xv, p. 379).

Although Mr. Moody's official biography declares that he takes no salary in any form, he possesses a palatial mansion at his old home at Northfield, in Massachusetts, runs a stud of fast horses, which he takes a great delight in driving and training to beat the stock of his neighbor farmers, and carries on half a dozen boarding-houses conducted on the principle—which proves to be a lucrativ one—of teaching piety as well as the three r's. In addition to all these luxuries, Mr. Moody is an extensiv owner of real estate in his nativ town, all of which he acquired the title to since he became an evangelist. Thus in Mr. Moody's case has the maxim proved true that "Godliness is profitable for the life that now is as well as for that which is to come."

The great convention of Freethinkers for Dec. 13th, 1884, is the absorbing topic in Toronto. The committee for getting up a musical entertainment for the delegates are busily at work rehearsing sweet strains and heavenly harmony in linked sweetness long drawn out. R. B. BUTLAND.

What Are Those Methods?

From Liberty.

Rome was not built in a day, and the sun will rise several times more before Anarchy is fully realized. It will be realized first where it is easiest and most important to realize it—that is, in banking and commerce. Through these it will gradually exercise a remarkable influence upon the ways and tendencies, the mental and moral habits of all the people, and this revolution in human nature will then make it possible to regulate by Anarchistic methods all the matters in which interests are most involved.

News and Notes.

Salamanca Convention has just closed. The winds blew and the rains came down, and altogether there seemed to be a general smash-up of the elements Saturday and Sunday, and about all we could do was to wait and be patient. Nevertheless we had a good time. Eloquent speeches were made. Brave Burnham, of Michigan, bore the brunt of the day courageously, assisted by C. B. Reynolds, and in spite of all something was accomplished, and the campaign faltered not. Wakeman made a noble address, touching the hights of our great argument, and outlining the wonderful work of the future, based on an illustrious line of descent from the heroic past. Outside the meetings we had a splendid social life, and this we think will be continued, for Salamanca has a gracious host of women who will certainly help develop the new work of Liberalism in the line of moral and sociable culture. A fuller account of the convention will be given next week. See also what our good friend, Mrs. A. M. Booth, has done by a little consecrated labor. Let others do likewise, and how soon success will be assured to our pioneer work. It is by each doing his or her level best in every community that will set the tide rolling on to irresistible conquest.

Let each Liberal scan the lecture engagements of Watts and Putnam, and if they find that they will come within hailing distance of their own home, send word at once, and if arrangements can be made they shall hav a night's campaign work that shall giv them new enthusiasm. Broaden and multiply the fields of labor so that our best men can be put into the very front and kept constantly pouring hot shot into the enemy's ranks.

Don't let our Pennsylvania friends forget the grand state convention to come off at Altoona. We purpose to make that a shining mark in Liberalism. There are some royal souls at Altoona, generous and devoted to the cause, and there will be plenty of inspiration both for eloquence and action. Those who come will enjoy a rare treat. They shall hav poetry, and they shall hav reality; the promis of the future, and the fruit of to-day. Come to the feast and be prepared to join, armed cap-a-pie, the great host of Liberals.

Some of our friends are disposed to criticise. We welcome every frank expression of opinion. The National League is not an invalid that it needs any favors shown to it in the spirit of pity. It is a strong man, and will show by its life that it is based upon the right principle. It is not for policy or for popularity that we aim, but for a chance to do a great work, to bring all honest Liberals together, and to establish justice. What grander work is there than to establish justice, to vindicate the right of free thought and free speech? To do this in a broad and charitable spirit is the aim of the League to-day. Its cry is consecration, and consecration to meet the impending crisis, to do our best on the basis of the Nine Demands, and a victory won here is a victory that will be felt in the depths of the ages. We trust to time to vindicate the wisdom of our course, and to show forth the glory and the usefulness of that unity for which we strive.

Brief Correspondence.

C. H. BETTS, North Wolcott, N. Y.: Please find inclosed $1 for the Campaign Fund. I heartily approve of the action of the National League, and I hope that every Liberal will do all he can to promote its success and thereby hasten the day when reason, truth, and common sense will reign supreme, and ignorance and superstition be no more. Yours for the success of the League.

DR. E. F. BEALS, West Winfield, N. Y.: Inclosed is one dollar, for this quarter, for Liberal League Campaign Fund. I am very much interested in the Liberal movement, and I hope the time is near when such men as Watts and Chainey will cease to wrangle over Spiritualism and Atheism, and work in harmony for humanity. I am glad to see THE TRUTH SEEKER so ably conducted. I hav been a subscriber since its commencement, when it was a seventy-five-cent paper.

NEW YORK, Nov 14, 1884.

Mr. Geo. M. Hare, vice-president of Veteran Liberal League, Soldiers' Home, Milwaukee, Wis., has been discharged by the board of managers for refusing to serve his punishment for telling the truth about the Home mismanagement. He was set adrift on the county road, without money, and refused his trunk, and went to the poor house, from whence his friends hav taken him home to Oshkosh, Wis. Is not this most outrageous treatment of one deserving the gratitude of this nation? JOHN P. GUILD.

DR. LUDWIG FRITSCH, Evansville, Ind.: Ingersoll will speak here on the 26th of November. If I knew the time Messrs. Watts and Putnam could speak here I would hav posted and distributed circulars in our Opera House at Ingersoll's lecture. I shall see Col. Ingersoll and ask him to announce Messrs. Watts and Putnam are coming, and thus prepare for their arrival. Col. Ingersoll made, on his second lecture in this city, $3,000, so you may judge what immense crowds were listening to his discourse.

MRS. ELIZA B. BURNZ, 24 Clinton Place, New York: I trust the Liberals at the places where Messrs. Putnam, Watts, and Reynolds lecture will not forget that the proceeds of Liberal Hymn Books, ordered from me through those gentlemen, for three months to come, is devoted to sustaining them in the lecture field. To show that these hymn books are worth purchasing by Liberals, I append a letter sent me by the Hon. Wm. H. Herndon, formerly law partner of our honored president, Abraham Lincoln:

"MRS. BURNZ, My Dear Madam: Some few days since I received from you, as I suppose, a specimen copy of your Liberal (new) hymn book, revised edition. I hav read over each hymn and find the number most excellent. I sincerely thank you for the specimen copy. The songs are lifeful, joyous, and gladsome; and when well sung by a large choir they will ring along the aisles of our nature and search every rounded or sharp corner in the vaults of the soul. The higher the civilization the greater is the love of music. You know what Earth's Poet said:

'The man that hath not music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,

Songs and music are necessities of our age, and all Liberals—especially where there are enough members to form a society—should hav a good Liberal hymn book of aidful and cheerful songs. I am happy to find that you do not sing of grief, sorrow, blood, gloom, hell, and the like. Of nature, justice, love, hope, home, truth, and the like, you sing hopeful and sweetly. Good music is worship; it lifts up our religious soul to high and lofty thoughts, which burst with will and action in practical life. I do seriously recommend your book to all Liberals everywhere.

"Yours most respectfully, WM. H. HERNDON."

A. H. SCHOW, Oakland, Cal.: A letter has come into my hands from Chas. B. Reynolds to the Oakland Liberal League. This League had to suspend their meetings for lack of means and interest. We hav plenty of Liberals in Oakland, but cannot organize them. Col. Ingersoll had crowded houses Dr. York lectures here now to fair houses. Inclosed find $1 for the Lecture Fund. Please change the time on my TRUTH SEEKER. Giv Mr. Chas. Watts, or any other lecturer who may come to this country, my address, and I will giv them what points I can to help the cause along, and I may kill the best Cleveland rooster I hav got. Yours for truth and mental liberty.

J. ACHILLIS LAMBETH AND LAURENA A., his wife, Leadville, Col.: I and my wife will giv twelve dollars for the year. Inclosed are three dollars for the first quarter. In January, will send twenty-five dollars for a life membership in the National Liberal League for my wife, who is as ardent in the cause of progress and Freethought as I am. Only for the failure of the bank in which I had all the ready money I had, would send you much more, for we both think that every one of Liberal thought should do all in their power to help you and Mr. Watts in your efforts to carry on the good work. May you both be helped in every way, so as to insure you the success that we all wish you in breaking down the power of priests and church securing secularization of our government, and making this really a free country and a free people.

JOHN A. JOST, OGDEN, UTAH: The Ogden Liberal League No. 95 reorganized Oct. 27th, with twenty members. We think we can vouch for forty members at five cents per month for the National Liberal League. We hav had no meetings for the past two years, but since reorganization (Oct. 27th) hav regular weekly meetings, with average attendance of about fifty. Our officers are: president, G. A. Parks; secretary and treasurer, John A. Jost. An old school Materialist of the Hub of the Kneeland school furnishes us with a hall, and guarantees its continuance while there is a League to meet there. It was built for the purpose. and has a seating capacity of over three hundred. It has an inscription in golden letters on a marble slab prominent in front: "Agnostic Hall. Light—Let it Shine" The hall also has the best reed organ in the place, costing $175, this and furniture and fixings furnished by the Kneeland Hub man.

D. B. COZINE, Lexington, Ky.: In my last letter I promised a little donation to the Lecture Fund, and now I make that promis good by inclosing $2.00—one for the purpose named, the other as a trial subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which please hand either to Mr. Macdonald or Mr. Somerby. I hav seen one or two copies of the paper, and like it very much. It's just such a paper as Liberalism needs: the manly, open, fearless manner in which its editor expresses his opinions, the aptitude and ability of his arguments, the felicity of his language, and his powers of analysis are to be commended to all liberty-loving individuals, especially those who wish the world freed from orthodox superstition and enslaving priestcraft. I wish I had the power—the power of a Shakspere or Milton—I would impress in letters of living fire upon the mind of all Infidels the vast importance of sustaining our live, capable, and reliable Liberal publications. The cause of enlightened human progress, of mental liberty, the peace and security of our homes, and the happiness of civilized communities, rest largely on our efforts in this direction. So rally around the flag, friends, and don't let it be said we allowed a first-class Infidel publication to die for lack of appreciation and sustenance. And remember a cause without an organ is like a wagon without a horse—unable to move either way. I declare I had almost forgotten to whom I was writing; whether to you or the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The fact is, however, I had become so interested in the subject, I almost lost sight of the object for which the letter was intended. So you must pardon me if I hav intruded upon your valuable time. I hav talked up your lecture you think of delivering in this city, and the few I hav spoken to concerning it seem to think it a good thing. The pernicious, baneful influences, and the deprivation wrought by the priests in this city, are truly wonderful. The Infidels are powerless, as it were. The minister has the advantage of us. He has recourse to the public through his pulpit, and under the false pretense of accomplishing great good for society, he can slander and abuse those who differ with him in opinion to his heart's content. We cannot reply to him, and if we try to do so through the public press, we are ostracized as moral lepers, and unfit for a decent man to associate with. All this needs righting, and I know of no men more capable to fill such a responsible position than Mr. Watts and yourself. So if you conclude to pay us a visit you will receive a hearty welcome. Though by few, it will be none the less generous.

H. VAN PELT, Cleveland, O.: I hav for a long time wanted to write a few lines on a subject that has long weighed heavy on my mind, and now, as I hav contributed my mite to the League Fund, I will take the liberty to make a single suggestion, and that is concerning the Sunday-schools, falsely called Sabbath schools. In my opinion the Sunday-school is the church's right bower, which the church plays for all it is worth. and I think that we should use as efficient means to enlighten the young and tender mind as is used by the church. I know, by my experience, that they take all the children that they can induce to attend their schools, and teach them everything but the truth, and by the time that the children are old enough to quit Sunday-school, they are so firmly established and grounded in the dogmas and superstitions of the church that it is next to impossible to get them to think or read anything but what the minister would recommend. I hav tried to get several such persons to read some Freethought books or papers; but they generally refuse, because they say that they do not want their faith disturbed, and that faith was first implanted in them in the Sunday-school, and I firmly believe that if the Sunday-school should be discontinued for the space of twenty-five years, not one in a dozen ministers would find employment as ministers at any price, but the church will not giv up the Sunday-schools, but will continue to manufacture members for Christian churches, and that, too, partly out of Freethinking families who, for the sake of popularity, allow their children to attend such schools. Now, I believe in using the most powerful weapons in war, and I would suggest that Messrs. Putnam and Watts should, wherever they go, endeavor to establish Liberal Sunday-schools for the purpose of teaching the children the errors, contradictions, bigotry, falsehoods, cruelties, and inconsistencies of the old book. And I firmly believe that until we do so we will make slow progress, and fail to make that progress that we might make if we had Sunday-schools of our own. I am more convinced of the truth of it by reading an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 8th, headed, "The Social Feature Necessary to Liberal Work." If every Liberal-minded person would read that piece carefully, I believe that Sunday-schools would be established generally, and I hope that Messrs Putnam and Watts will make strong efforts wherever they go to establish such schools. Now, please don't think that I want to dictate; I only want to suggest.

Literary Notes.

OF Remsburg's "Bible Morals" and "False Claims," Hon. W. H. Herndon, of Springfield, Ill., writes: "I hav just finished reading 'Bible Morals,' and am highly pleased with it. It is a truly practical lecture; it deals in facts and figures, and will do the Liberal cause great good, and its author great honor. I hope it will be published in pamphlet form like 'False Claims.' Both these lectures would do honor to any man. They are so practical, so plain, so simple, so terse, so logical, and so truly eloquent."

THE articles in the Popular Science Monthly for December are, "The Reformation in Time-keeping;" "American Aspects of Anthropology;" "School-Culture of the Observing Faculties;" "Queer Flowers;" "Alcoholic Trance;" "The Problem of Universal Suffrage;" "Cannibalism as a Custom;" "Starvation; Its Moral and Physical Effects;" "The Chemistry of Cookery;" "Perils of Rapid Civilization;" "Religion and the Doctrin of Evolution;" "Liquefaction of the Elementary Gases;" "The Oil Supply of the World;" "Oddities of Animal Character;" "Biographical sketch of Edward B. Tylor (with portrait);" and the usual amount of correspondence, literary notices, popular miscellany, and notes. The scientific articles this time are very interesting, but the Rev. Mr. Temple's paper must hav been inserted in deference to the religious views of the publishers. It has no particular merit of its own to recommend it.

THE danger of incidental harm to the community, or to certain classes of people, from the increased use of machinery, the extension of public works, etc., is greatly diminished when those who make the laws, and especially those whose duty it is to interpret them, recognize that law is a progressiv science; that it is a means, not an end; that when a state of things arises for which there is no precedent, a new precedent must be made. How the most enlightened jurists hold this principle constantly in view, and how the common as well as the statute law is thus made to keep pace with the general advance of civilization, is admirably set forth in the leading article in the North American Review for December, "Labor and Capital before the Law," by Judge T. M. Cooley, of Michigan. To the same number William K. Ackerman contributes some suggestiv "Notes on Railway Management," Dr. Schliemann tells what he found in his excavations of the ruins of Tiryns, in Southern Greece, and Principle Shairp supplements his scholarly article on "Friendship in Ancient Poetry" with one on "Friendship in English Poetry." The other articles in the number are, "The British House of Lords," by George Ticknor Curtis, and "Responsibility for State Roguery," by John F. Hume.

Agnosticism.

The most serious objection to the use of the word Agnosticism in reference to the attitude of any class of thinkers is that it is purely negativ, it refers, not to any principle or belief, but is a word whose meaning is perfect ignorance. The objection to the use of the word as justly representing any mode of thought is further increased because it does not specify on what subjects it disclaims any knowledge, or its possibility. The truth is that all men are Agnostics; and to designate one particular mode of thought as Agnostlcism is a tacit assumption that others do know. It is not convenient to find a name to adequately represent any mode of philosophy; but if a name were to be used, it would, of necessity, be exclusiv in its application, and, like the distinguishing names of religious sects, would necessarily imply that those who were not of such a persuasion could not rightly assume the name. Whether a man believes or disbelieves in a certain doctrin does not affect the certainty of his knowledge or ignorance. A proposition is or is not capable of proof. If it is not, then candor would compel us to confess our ignorance. If it is, but has not been proven, even then we must withhold our asssent until it is proven. Religious fanaticism has taken the advantage of the word Agnosticism, and has made it to mean (to the religious world) a total ignorance of everything—a universal skepticism. Nothing is more unjust; and yet nothing else could be expected when any class of reformers, or of radical thinkers, used it to distinguish themselvs from others. In relation to the doctrin of a personal God, and the immortality of the human soul, however strong may be one's faith, honesty compels every one to admit his total ignorance concerning them. Accepting the hypothesis of modern thought that the authropomorphic idea of God is the last relic of savage superstition—and feeling for its advocates the same commiseration that is felt for more barbarous conceptions of the gods—and recognizing the utter absurdity of man attempting to arrive at exact knowledge of the infinit, or of changing its (or his) purposes, we all must admit that of the infinit power that produces all phenomena, we are totally ignorant. The most devout Christian is also compelled to admit that whatever may be his belief, he knows nothing of God. In point of fact, then, the Christian is necessarily an Agnostic. His belief in a personal God counts for nothing. Since his hypothesis cannot be proven, it cannot be believed. So, too, respecting the immortality of the soul. Even if it were true, as Spiritualists claim, that the physical principle of man survives the death of the body and remains intact in the preservation of consciousness, volition, and intelligence, even then that could not be a proof of its immortality. Because no proof is possible in such a case. And the utmost that it can prove is that death does not destroy the primal characteristics of individual human life.

Agnosticism is negativ, because it not only withholds assent from the two cardinal doctrins of the religion of the past—a personal God and the immortality of man—but it declares it impossible for us to arrive at any knowledge on these questions.

But it is impossible for any belief or course of thought to be purely negativ in its practical results. The activity of the mind necessitates something positiv, definit. This seems to be overlooked by the opponents of Agnosticism, when they charge it with being the greatest enemy to human morality and happiness by denying the existence of a personal God and the immortality of the soul. The Christian affirms that if there is no personal God to make and enforce his laws and the penalties for disobedience thereto, then there is no sanction to any right course of conduct, no reason why one should forego the most sensual pleasures of life. Greater force is supposed to lie in this familiar argument when it is announced that if this life is all there is for mankind, then we may as well giv vent to our passions, reap the greatest possible amount of happiness from the unlimited gratification of our lowest propensities; and in all things make self-aggrandizement the all-absorbing purpose of life. It is difficult to find any other reason than moral and intellectual insanity for such expressions. "What is the purpose of life? Why should we suffer and toil if, after all, the grave is the absolute termination of human hope and consciousness?" are questions incessantly put to the Agnostic. What can he say in reply? Simply this: "I know not whether death is the end of individual life or not; as far as I do know, I think it is. But whether it is or is not, of one thing I am sure: that it is better to do good, to be right, to exercise self-control under every circumstance in life; to be generous and just, and faithful in the discharge of duty, whether there is another life or not. And even if the mere consideration of personal happiness is concerned, I do not believe that that end is reached by defying every known principle of morality; by setting at naught the loftiest aspirations and sublimest feelings of the human mind, and by making supreme selfishness the ultimate purpose of conduct. Respecting the problem of conscious life after death, I am perfectly ignorant, but should that ignorance be a justifiable excuse for disregarding the right and setting at naught the feelings and interests of others? Must I make this life miserable for both myself and others, because I am not sure of life being eternal? The right is the best in this world as well as elsewhere, and I need no higher sanction than the welfare of others to prompt me to do right." The Agnostic could say this and much more to the person who wonders at good conduct coming from any other motiv than fear of punishment or hope of reward.

The ethical difference between Agnosticism and Spiritualism (I here use the word Spiritualism to include all those whose considerations for conduct here are derived from the prospect of another life) lies in the fact that the one believes in working for the improvement of mankind in this life, whereas the other makes the future life the pole-star of life and of conduct. It should not be overlooked that the means adopted by these antagonistic parties must in the main differ. The history of Liberalism within the last few years furnishes proof sufficient that with few exceptions, parties with such antipodal views do not work in harmony. This is to be regretted, but can not be prevented. I see no reason to disparage those who, acting under the influence of a belief in a future life, aim to improve the condition of mankind in this world. Neither do I see the consistency of such persons casting reflections on us (Agnostics) for honestly striving in the best manner known to us to meet the same end. Methods will differ in the same ratio that individual minds differ. It is, therefore, far from creditable to cast insinuations or reflect on the motivs of others simply because of proposed differences in the accomplishment of any needed reform.

Practically, then, the superiority of Agnosticism may easily be seen by observing the fact that all its proposed reforms hav an exclusiv reference to this life in its totality, and is not in the least bewildered by any reference to a supposed condition of existence of which nothing is definitly known. That considerations for the future hav interfered with the present life is inseparably connected with the historic development of all religions. Prayers and fastings, depreciation of the body and its passions; the celibacy of both sexes; penance in its varied forms; disparagement of reason and the exaltation of credulous faith; these and all other monstrosities of religion hav been produced either by a strict obedience to gods, or with the expectation of improving the future by making this life the more miserable. Christianity no less than other religions makes this life worthless by contrasting its brevity with eternal life, and by drawing our attention to endless felicity, thereby throwing a greater disparagement on the happiness of this life. So effectually has it succeeded that with the prospect of heaven, with the hope of securing eternal joy, there has been a total disregard (among the poor and oppressed) for the sufferings of this life. The growth of doubt and the strengthening of the moral sense were the principal causes of arresting the pending destruction of the race. Whatever may hav been its attitude to other questions, it fundamentally agreed with the most advanced forms of Secularism. It is useless, men said, to impose suffering, or deprive ourselvs of the best gifts of nature with the hope of bettering our condition after death. It is the growth of this spirit that has led all reforms, and that in spite of religious conservatism has wandered from the old paths. Not only so, the good that has come from the improvement of the arts, the advantages of mechanical inventions for the economy of human labor, the benefits to mankind accruing from the discoveries of scientific investigation, and all the great reforms of the past hav been produced by an exclusiv consideration for the improvement of mankind in this world (although so-called religious reforms may not be recognized in the category of true reform, yet they all hav been produced by the consciousness of evil in this world coming from ecclesiastical sources). The more powerful the feeling of the principles of Secularism, the greater the disposition to make this life more agreeable. Instead of the belief of the Agnostic causing him to act without reason or principle, facts testify to the contrary. And, by the way, I would suggest that our opponents consider the cause of such (to them) an anomaly. Every departure from the asceticism of Christianity and other forms of Paganism carries with it a corresponding growth of "worldliness," or Secularism; of making this life worth living, irrespectiv of another life.

It will naturally be said by Spiritualists that instead of their methods and practices conflicting with temporal success and happiness, they promote them; and by such means prepare mankind for a higher, though in essential respects similar, existence to this. This is the supposed stronghold of that system of faith. But to be logically supported it must assume that the future differs in no essential particular from the present. An opposit supposition would invalidate all efforts in that direction that would be warranted by our present knowledge of things. Giving Spiritualists, then, the advantage of such a position, it is only just to say that it is derived from the spirit of Secularism, which alone recognizes the supreme importance of removing the evils of life. And the only possible good that may exist in Spiritual faiths is borrowed from the intense antipathy of the human mind to all forms of evil. Co-extensiv with human existence, both actual and prospectiv, is the desire to hav all evils and every encumbrance removed; and no form of faith can offer any additional motiv to the persistent prosecution of duty than is afforded by Agnosticism. I seriously doubt the honor, integrity, and virtue of any one who would act contrary to those principles if there was no prospect of another life. Instead of Agnosticism being a system of despair, it is otherwise; for contemporaneous with life itself is the possibility of both pleasure and misery. Because life may and must end, that is no reason for not deriving the most pleasure therefrom.

The frivolous idea that Agnostics hate the doctrin of a future life is not warranted by facts. But they decidedly object to hav life and its conduct determined by extremely doubtful issues. As with all other questions we are called on to decide, our personal preferences, our likes or dislikes, should hav no necessary relation to our conduct or belief. That a continued life is desirable—if that life affords the possibility and certainty of progress—is true; but what if it is the reverse? What if misery is the lot of all? Is not universal death preferable to universal woe? Is it not better to be assured that our little life is circumscribed by birth and death, than to be informed that we must suffer as long as thought, or life, or being lasts? It is better that the universe be draped with everlasting mourning over the destruction of sentient life, than that the wails and woes of suffering continually harass and disturb the desired rest of the mind.

To do right because it is right; to suffer for the benefit of others without the prospect of compensation, other than that afforded by the invariable action of law; to maintain honor, integrity, and virtue in spite of the brevity of life, are principles of conduct that are incapable of improvement.

Magian Myths.

A REPLY TO WRITERS IN THE TRUTH SEEKER OF AUG. 30TH.

Allow me to thank Mr. Lincoln and Coravar Amerig for their answers to my question about Mithras. The Druid lore of the latter seems to open a rich field, but to my ignorance the allusions are simply tantalizing. I could wish to see a more elaborate article from the same pen. I was aware that baptism and the communion were old Magian rites, but there is irreconcilable discrepancy between Mr. Amerig's account of Ormuzd, and that of writers hitherto known to me; they all agree with Anquetil Du Perron, who made Zend lore the chief object of his life, and obtained from the Parsees of India the perusal of their sacred books. All speak of Ormuzd and Ahriman as the good and evil principles born of "no woman," but of boundless time, and corresponding to nature's summer bounties, as Ahriman to the evils of the cold season, physical and moral. The morality, as well as the ritual deduced from this conception, is essentially agricultural, it relates virtue with prosperity and vice with misery.

Mithras, the solar force, modified by the earth's attitudes in alternate seasons, and corresponding to their whole annual career, may, rather than Ormuzd, whom the arch-druid identifies with Plennydh, correspond to Hu.

As the Amschaspands or good genii presiding over the elements are explained as beneficent aspects of Ormuzd, while earthquakes, pestilential fevers, and other maleficences, are regarded either as the works of Ahriman's assistant genii, or as so many aspects of Ahriman; so the same idiom of thought renders Ormuzd himself as the summer aspect of Mithras, and Ahriman as his winter aspect. As to the human form of Mithras, it is clearly a poet's or painter's image by analogy of youth with the spring-tide.

The chief value of these mythologic studies is to restore religious sentiment where it is due, viz, to useful and beautiful cultures, and those secondary creations which ally our human with the solar power. Here the mysteries and miracles are those of science, in conspiring with art. Such practical religion weans us from steril logomachies about the unknowable. Terra-solar physics will giv "the happy dispatch" to metaphysics and activism to theology.

Mr. Lincoln justly reproves "the inconsequential speculations and useless wranglings of Liberals and Spiritualists on subjects they can never settle," but as to the "grand old science and true key to the bottomless pit of all theological bedevilment," I look for that key, not in any mythological allegories, but in observation and experiment, industry and art. The grand science, the science of sciences, to which astronomy itself is indebted for its culture by the earlier astrologists, is the science of social destiny, to which attraction at once, sidereal and passional, affords the clew. To enlightened posterity, our wildest theological delusions will appear less astounding than the economic delusions of our democratic plutocracy. Mr. Lincoln magnifies the importance of the old Bible medley. I leave that to the priests who make their dishonorable livelihood by glozing on its texts. Astronomers hav always been, as they are now, too much in earnest, to go maundering in silly figures of speech, writing their observations and calculations so exact as to enable them to predict eclipses, as a series of conundrums in civil history, that of Israel doing common duty for the stars, or to translate the precession of the equinoxes by Ephraim's being joined to his idols. Such figures outrage analogy and common sense, and to write whole books like the Old Testament in this wise is at once incompatible with the exigencies of science, and inexplicable by any such motivs as diplomacy or warfare afford to the secret languages called ciphers. These, moreover, are not allegorical, but generally readable by a mechanical key. The conception of a disguise so grotesque, for a science not persecuted, is too extravagant for scientific sanity, and its elaborate execution, under the obvious narrativ of Judaism, as a blind to the uninitiated, seems to me no less absurd than the mysteries and miracles themselvs. The personification of "Time" in our old gentleman, Abraham, is about as far fetched as the pun, half Latin and half English, that draws him from the ram, "Ab-ram-ic." On the other hand, there is no question about the solar features of the Magian doctrins, nor that they were freely employed in the construction of Christianity. The man Jesus, divested of all astronomical trappings, has important moral suggestions, the value of which experiment only can decide. Whether borrowed, like much of the doctrin ascribed to him, i. e., Jesuism, and more of what the church has added, i. e., Christianity, from the majestic Magian allegories, the astronomical myth common to Jesus with Osiris, Mithras, and that group of solar youths, including, perhaps, Manco Copac, of Peru, is a loose overcoat easily drawn off without prejudice to the personality of the wearer, unless for the spurious sanctities of superstitious ritualism. I esteem that in view of such superstition, and of the popular taste for stories, you learned antiquarians and cosmopolite linguists would do a useful and agreeable and a lucrativ piece of work, if, instead of cracking your ab-ram-ic jokes on an old soldier like me, you would narrate the solar myths in a popular but artistic style, such as the original documents permit, but which they do not exemplify.

Diagrams may assist in explaining their scientific element, and dissecting the "old astronomical man" Dupuis, as a classical and encyclopedia authority. I do not remember in him the peculiar bias mentioned by Mr. Lincoln toward Egyptology; if, however, that is so, it accords very well with the recent studies of another writer, who makes Egyptian civilization the matrix of all. As to climate, that depends on the earth's axial inclinations, which do not appear to hav been the same as they are now when elephants browsed in the forests of Siberia. Egypt may then hav been more temperate.

Bacon, in his, "Wisdom of the Ancients," affords a fine model of the analogic view applied to Greek myths. His studies of the air-powers in Jupiter, and soil-powers in Proserpine, are delightful prose poems which natural philosophy rejoices in. Since his time, Sanskrit literature has made precious contributions to this little explored field of legitimate romance, which may very advantageously supersede our common-place personalities of vulgar slang novels.

Can Spirits Who Were Not Before Birth Exist After Death?

The present condition—so to speak—of the vast millions of human beings not yet born, but destined to liv in the future, and the present condition of the vast masses of humanity which hav lived and died in the past, are identical. The condition of each individual before birth and after death is the same. When the spirits of the unborn hover around us, and we can commune with our children's children not yet born, with the sages and thinkers, the poets and composers, of the future; when the spirits of the presidential candidates of 2884 can orate to us about the great issues of a thousand years hence, then, and not till then, will we possess analogous proof and circumstantial evidence that the spirits of the dead liv long after their physical bodies hav vanished.

It seems to be an axiom of science that that which has a beginning must hav an end, so it seems logical that the spirits or minds of those now living, and which had their beginning, say twenty, forty, or eighty years ago, must end. And all objects of nature seem subject to this imperativ law. Every flower, tree, creature, no matter how endowed with beauty and loveliness; every rock, world, sun, and system, at one time was not, and it is considered equally certain that at some time in the future they will cease to be. All hav a beginning, are evolved from the eternal potencies of infinit matter, grow for a few moments, or for a few millions of years, then decay, disintegrate, and again mingle with other forces, only to resume again, a link in the perpetual chain of growth and decay. The perpetuity of nature is dependent upon this law.

It is claimed by Spiritists that the life and intelligence of the present generation, hardly a member of which had an individual existence a century ago, will still exist a hundred, a thousand, a million, yes, even millions of billions of years hence—in fact, during all eternity! Now, I demand analogical proof for the assertion. What other thing, object, or phenomenon in nature which at one time was not, which at one time began, will continue to exist forever in the future? What besides man—as it is claimed—has one end, and no other end? What else has a commencement, then eternal continuation and statu quo? What other object in nature which has had an eternity of time preceding it's existence will not hav an eternity of time succeeding its existence? Is not this order of nature universal and arbitrary? Or is man indeed an exception to the rule, and destined to enjoy a miraculous and supernatural existence forever?

If one thing is positiv, and which must be conceded by all, it is the fact that a hundred years ago—barring centenarians—not a vestige of the individuality, intelligence, consciousness, minds, or spirits of the present generation was in existence, and also that to-day not a vestige of the spirits of future generations is manifest. What, then, does this overwhelming, absolute fact demonstrate? That mind or spirit begins and ends with the physical body; that it is not a separate entity, capable of independent existence, but simply a function, process, mode, or attribute of the living animal organism, which latter is a purely physical result, or growth of purely physical causes, and consequently subject to the laws of life and decay, like all other physical bodies. It proves that organic life (which is not to be confounded with the physical life, vitality, or immortal potencies of matter) and individual consciousness necessitate physical organism; that thought necessitates brain; sight, eyes; sound, ears; and all other functions their respectiv organs. It proves that mind and life are to the physical organism what force, motion, and action are to a clock or to a locomotiv, and we might as well expect nothing to indicate the time, or nothing, or the ghost of a locomotiv, to pull a train of cars, when every particle of iron and steel which compose the clock or locomotiv has been smashed, melted, and remodeled into ten-penny nails, as to expect to see the identical intelligence or spirits of John Jones or Peter Smith when every particle which composed the organisms of these good fellows has been transformed into grass, trees, flowers, cabbages, cows, and even into portions of many other human beings.

Let us suppose the case of a person who will be born in the year 5000—a very short period when compared with the vast cycles of ages of beginningless and endless time. Does the mind or spirit of this person exist to-day? Has it abstract existence; does it act and think now? No! no one so bold as to assert the activity or consciousness now of non-existence or of the coming man. Yet it would be no greater absurdity than to affirm the existence now of the dead. But, in course of time, as generation follows generation into oblivion—about the year 5000—involuntarily, by purely animal or physical process, a child is evolved and born. It has a living body of flesh and blood, which givs it outline, form, sex, and individuality. It has eyes to see, a stomach to digest food, a nervous system and brain to taste, perceive, and enjoy what conforms to its involuntary thought and sensation. Soon it is hungry; it cries, and taking the food into its stomach is the first pleasurable sensation. It opens its bright eyes and, for the first time, meets the sympathetic smile of its happy mother. It is telegraphed over a bundle of nerve cells to the brain, and it remembers what it has tasted and seen. This is the dawn of mind—of intellect. Who can say that without eyes, without a stomach and brain, any creature could ever evolve intelligence? It cannot be done. A noted case in proof was Kasper Hauser—supposed to hav been a prince—who, though a perfect child, from infancy was incarcerated in a dark dungeon for twenty years, coming in contact with no one. When finally released, he was but a living, breathing idiot, without mind or language.

Conception—a process virtually alike in all animals—causes the physical body, which in time aquires intelligence. The former is the cause, the latter the effect. The former alone makes the latter possible. It is as essential to its existence or continuance as oil is to a burning lamp, fuel to a locomotiv, or a main-spring to a watch. Who can prove that when the cause is removed which originated it and which is essential to its continuance, the effect can continue during all eternity? Who can prove that when the flesh and bone are gone, the outline of personality still remains? When all organs are annihilated their functions continue? That invisible and transparent organs and bodies are miraculously created and perform identical functions as those of the glowing and warm flesh and blood? That breathing, speaking, circulation, digestion, respiration, embracing, kissing, walking, etc., can be performed by these invisible, inconceivable, miraculous organs, just as well as with the physical? Who can prove it? No one! And I now affirm that all the combined so-called "proofs" ever supplied by so-called "mediums," no matter how astounding and mysterious and unexplainable at present by any other hypothesis than that of spirits; all the slate writing, visitations, inspirations, laying on of hands when in half slumber, like the lonely and (probably) longing Chainey, seeing (supposed) visions, cabinet and dark circle wonders, materializations, all together—the great sum total of all these mysteries are not as the figure one in comparison to a million when compared to that one grand, startling, and overwhelming mystery how it can be possible that when a man is dead—when all and every particle which made him a man has assumed other forms, when his whole being is annihilated and he has vanished—the identical man can still liv! Any dark-circle "proof," any locked-slate message, no matter how startling, is therefore not only not explained by attributing the phenomena to spirits, but the mystery is infinitly enlarged by the question arising, How do spirits do it? How can they exist?

I therefore insist that spirit existence—if a reality—is absolutely unthinkable, and beyond the reach of scientific investigation, and contrary to all else in nature not resolvable into component parts, nor possessing outline, weight, or tangibility, and therefore must ever be consigned to realms of ghosts and spooks.

And here again occurs to me—if this doctrin were true—the startling absurdity and worthlessness of physical existence: If man after death can exist during all eternity without the wonderful and subtle organism which now makes him a man, what a waste of natural energy is it that this splendid form was produced at all? For surely if we can exist during all eternity without flesh, bone, and organs, physical existence here for a few paltry years is a lamentable failure, and the sooner we can get rid of it the better.

But the proposition, as I said in a previous letter, is all idle speculation, and the cunning device of avaricious priests and cranky visionaries, not at all including in the latter the many intelligent believers in Spiritualism, but only applying these sweeping terms to the organizers and inventors of the giant delusion. From a paper published in the Popular Science Monthly, and republished in the Radical Review, entitled "Where and How We Remember," by M. Allen Starr, M.D., I quote: "It thus becomes evident, from the study of brain disease, that our visual memories, our auditory memories, our memories of motion, and our memories of speech, may each be lost, while other memories are unaffected; and, further, that a loss of any one of these memories is always due to disease in its own appropriate part of the brain." Thus showing the entire dependence of every function of man's intellect upon the brain. I urge all your readers to read this splendid and instructiv essay.

Materialism or Atheism.

No doubt many innocent and lovely people are seriously afflicted with the apprehension that this beautiful world is growing godless, or "Godless," by which they mean that men and women are multiplying who hav too much respect for material things, and either deny or do not believe that there ever existed a spiritual being or person who created all things out of nothing; or that a vacuum, whether infinit or finite, can think. If asked how matter came to be, they will perhaps say, "We don't know," or, "It always was." Strength, beauty, and brain, of which some are too proud to be vain, and with which some are as cruel as Cain, whence do they come? They'll answer, "From sun, lightning, and rain, their natural home," making mere matter and motion the first causes of whatever we see, hear, feel, smell, taste, or think of, the origin not only of men, women, and children, but of a practically infinit series of living organisms from the biggest sea-monster down to the invisible and indivisible individual atom of matter. It is only to postulate sex and mobility to ultimate atoms, and the how of things is much simplified without assuming a beginning. This is about what an Athiest did who was born nearly a century before Jesus of Nazareth. His name was Titus Lucretius Carus, a precious good name whether the man was precious or not. He wrote about the "Nature of Things," by far the grandest poem in the Latin language. Priests of the pagan theology pooh-poohed it. Those of the Christian theology never, so far as I know, recommend boys to read it in college. But, wonderful to say, in 1766 was born a Quaker, by the name of John Dalton, who became famous as the father of the "atomic theory" in chemistry. Beyond the presumption, from the fact of his having been born in a Quaker family, I can find no evidence of his entertaining any theological theory whatever. Guided by the abstract, uncreated, eternal verities of mathematics, he started a series of experiments by which modern chemistry, almost wholly within this century, has established the doctrin of dear old Lucretius, by which he nobly aimed to free this world from superstition and establish the brotherhood of the human race. Since the death of Dalton, in 1837, Materialists and Atheists hav multiplied in the scientific world with exceeding rapidity, so that theology may well shake in all its shoes, but why should theologians do so? Is not nature, including the human, wide enough to giv them pleasant work to do?

Newton to the Front Again.

Last Sunday Heber Newton recurred to the subject which obtained for him his notoriety as a heretical Episcopalian. The inspiration of the scriptures was his subject. The view he now takes is that not only is there one inspired Bible, but that there are many Bibles all equally "inspired" in parts. Plenary inspiration he considered to be a full-sized mistake. He thinks "God" speaks in the Bible, but with limitations. All the men who wrote in it were not inspired, and neither was all that they wrote. The recognition of this was the first step in the doctrin of inspiration. "The second step in the doctrin of divine inspiration is the recognition of it in other sacred books than ours. Other people hav had bibles which were revered by them with a devoutness not surpassed by our reverence for our Bible. In the absence of any first-hand knowledge of these books, it was easy for our fathers to deny to them the claim of inspiration. The fathers also classed the wonderful people of China and India with the Hottentots as heathens. But, tried by whatever test we apply to our own Bible, we find in these bibles tokens of inspiration. Those of us who hav read these bibles in private know how they inspired us, and caused us to regret that we could not bring into our public services the noble words of these Eastern saints. The time will come, and come soon, when, instead of reading a dry bit of Jewish history because it is in our Bible, we shall wisely choose some lofty strain of ethical teaching from those other bibles, which are profitable for reproof and for correction, and for edification in righteousness, and therefore, according to St. Paul, are inspired."

Mr. Newton read passages from Socrates, Plato, and other Greek philosophers, and said: "If we deny the inspiration of this we must deny the inspiration of the Bible. The fathers say that God does not now speak to man as of old, the true faith having been taught. They even giv the date when inspiration ceased. The spirit of God cannot hav ceased to speak eighteen centuries ago, unless, indeed, he exhausted himself in making the book of Revelation. Has he nothing more to say to his children since then? Has he been thinking no thoughts new to men and doing no new deeds of creation of which he might well speak to his children since then? Hav there been no new phases of truth calling for fresh explanations from the great teacher? Has God seen his children groping in the darkness and put out no helping hand? What is the work of God for man if it be not the improvement of man materially, physically, mentally, and spiritually? Were not the haunting thoughts of Columbus the voice of God? Does not the cunning of the inventor come with the breath of God? Is not each great discovery in science an inspiration from God? We assert man's consciousness of inspiration through the inspiration of the men who wrote our Bible, the inspiration of the men who wrote other bibles, the inspiration of the saints of all times, and the inspiration of the men who in every sphere of life seek the truth that they may do their fellows service."

Now, all of this is the rankest heresy, and the admission of its truth would be as fatal to the fundamental claims of Christianity as the discovery of the rotundity of the globe was to Biblical cosmology. It is also in direct opposition in teaching to the doctrins of his church. The sixth of the Thirty-Nine Articles to which Mr. Newton subscribed at his ordination lists the canonical and authoritativ books of the Bible, and nothing is said about any portion of them being uninspired or as having a less "divine" nature than the rest. And then to claim for the Vedas and the Koran, for Socrates and Plato, for Columbus and Galileo, for all the great minds of all the ages, an inspiration from the same God that is by Christians supposed to hav written the Bible that consigns them all to an eternal hell, is as much a violation of Christian doctrin and as far from orthodox as the writings of Voltaire or the orations of Ingersoll.

We wonder if another attempt will not be made to disciplin the pulpit of All Souls church!

Christianity in Italy.

Our brethren of Italy, according to a late dispatch from Rome, hav abundant evidence of the rottenness of the church of Rome in the numerous priestly scandals which hav recently come to light. Scarcely a day passes which does not expose the details of some shocking occurrence in which a priest is concerned, and the idea is prevalent that an epidemic of priestly crime has set in.

The crimes so far given are all against women. At Marcellina, a small village in the north of Italy, near Rivoli and Turin, a sacristan named Progetti fatally stabbed a priest with a dagger for eloping with his wife, and on appeal refusing to surrender her. At Pozzone, near Caserta, seventeen miles from Naples, the mayor of the village stabbed a curé for seducing his sister. At Marinella, near Civita Vecchia, a captain in the navy named Gelli discovered that criminal relations existed between his wife and daughter and the village priest. Gelli killed his wife with a stiletto, but did not molest her betrayer. He was tried for murder and was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. In the Via Lungara, at Rome, a priest named Angelo Lardi, seventy years of age, has been arrested for stabbing a maiden who resisted his advances.

These are the more prominent of the many crimes which hav occurred, and the feeling of abhorrence and disgust has latterly become so pronounced, and threats of popular vengeance so loud, that even the walls of the Vatican were not proof against them. As a matter of policy, the pope has been obliged to take cognizance of the immoral and murderous conduct of his priests, and, it is stated, has authorized an investigation with the intent of restraining the brutal violence of his minions.

It will be wise for the pope to do this. Though a whitewashing of some and excommunication of other priests will not change the fact that the whole church of Rome is saturated with immorality in its various forms, yet the very life of the institution in Italy is dependent upon the good behavior of its leaders. Probably in no country does the pope command so little personal respect from the masses of the people as in Italy. He has repeatedly been hissed when in ceremonial procession, and it is on this account that he rarely shows himself in public, preferring to pose before the Catholic world as the prisoner of the Vatican. It only needs a few outrages of the kind chronicled above to rouse the populace to acts of reprisal, and to breed in their hearts a still more bitter hatred of the pope and his church.

A Growth in Public Sentiment.

As an illustration of how rapidly the people are outgrowing the notions of the Puritans who once dominated the country, the great change in regard to Sunday keeping in this city has been cited. A comparison of the day as now spent with the day the church fanatics endeavored to fasten upon the city immediately after the adoption of the new code, shows not only how futil such legislation must be, but a great unanimity of public sentinent against the New England Sabbath. Like many another legal statute, the Sunday law is now much more honored in the breach than in the observance. It is not so very many months ago that the "Sunday-Closing League" had its spies all over the city, attempting to imprison or fine about every one who dared to do anything except eat and go to church on Sunday. Sunday cars were to be stopped, Sunday newspapers should not be published, ferry-boats were to be tied up, and New Yorkers were not to be allowed off the island. Then, all varieties of stores were to be closed, and even the boot-blacks and flower girls were to be prevented from earning the customary five-pences. The courts were filled with tradesmen caught violating the law, and many thousands of dollars in fines were extracted from the profits of the shop-keepers. For the first few Sundays the arrests were very numerous. The magistrates had their time taken up in disposing of these cases. The work of the "League" got to be a nuisance. The Society's agents received some pretty hard raps from unsympathetic judges on the inconsistency of their arresting people for violating a law which they themselves broke when they went about on Sundays as detectivs collecting evidence against other people. Now, hardly an arrest a month is made, and the magistrates discharge nearly every such case brought before them; and for the year ending October, 1884, only fifty persons were taken up for such violation, and their persecution ended with the arrest. The occupation of the "Sunday-Closing League" is gone.

This result is owing to the enmity of public sentiment to the law. A policeman hesitates to make an arrest for an offense neither he nor the public regards as in any way criminal; the magistrates, still more intelligent, will not punish a person for doing that which is in nowise wrong, and in which public sentiment is so unmistakably with the man at the bar. Even the churches, with the exception of the Methodist and Presbyterian bodies, are outgrowing the traditions of a Puritan Sunday. People now move about as freely, and amuse themselvs as unrestrictedly, as before the reviving of the law. The pious are free to go to church; the worldly to the concert; the studious to the reading-rooms. So much practical advance has now been made, that it is safe to predict that within the next five years New York will hav a "continental Sunday;" not by permission of the priests, but because the people hav grown to the rational enjoyment of a day at one time the season of unrestrained secret dissipation and untrammeled public piety.

Liberal Divorce Laws.

The Italian ministry hav recommended to Parliament a divorce law more sweeping even than the French bill recently passed. It provides that couples without children who may hav been separated three years shall upon proof being presented be entitled to absolute divorce. In case the union shall hav been productiv of children, a separation of five years, with satisfactory guarantees as to the provision for their offspring, is demanded.

This is about as common sense a law as legislators are in the habit of conceiving, and if it shall pass the Italian Parliament that country is likely to be troubled with fewer wife murders and husband poisonings, not to mention habitual domestic infelicities, than it is now. Of course the pope denounces the bill vigorously, but his opposition weighs little in the consideration of moral questions.

A Very Encouraging Vote.

In Washington territory, in addition, it seems, to Wyoming, unless the two hav got confounded in the press dispatches, a vote was taken at the last election upon the question of church taxation. The Seattle Daily Post-Intelligencer givs a partial resumé of the vote by counties as follows:

Counties.	Yes.	No.
Columbia,	822	701
Lincoln,	501	1,230
Mason,	150	38
Island,	152	43
Lewis,	489	431
Spokane,	635	950
King,	2,756	1,375
Skagit,	579	547
Snohomish,	530	238
Walla Walla,	1,080	903
Whatcom,	489	316
Kittitas,	489	302
Whitman,	1,048	1,552
Clarke,	1,369	354
Chehalis,	454	335
Thurston,	883	426
Klickitat	460	284
Total,	12,886	10,025

If this result shall be sustained by the official returns, it will be a glorious victory for justice. In the city of Seattle alone over $80,000 worth of church property will contribute to the revenues of the state.

An Inquiry from Mr. Mitchell.

"The Man versus the State."
"Mr. Spencer against All England."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My feelings are that there may be an important meaning in the words Mr. Harrison has quoted from Mr. Spencer, but what can we know about it simply by the few words Mr. Harrison has quoted? As an earnest, practical reformer, I want to know what Mr. Spencer meant by "The Man versus the State." If he means that man has rights and "the State" has none, then it is a statement of vast importance. Man has rights; states hav none. Is that what Mr. Spencer means? For one I am deeply interested to know. Again, What is the meaning of "Mr. Spencer against All England?" Mr. Spencer as a man, and all other men, hav rights. England, nor any other nation, never had any rights. I earnestly want to know the meaning of what I hope may hav a meaning of vast importance to all those who wish to free mankind from the despotic power of all governments of force.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

[Mr. Spencer's "Man versus the State" is a consideration by that great philosopher of the respectiv rights of the individual and of society. Mr. Harrison said the title might better be "Mr. Spencer against All England," because Mr. Spencer's views are not those generally accepted by society, and are certainly at wide variance with the socialistic theories. While Mr. Spencer is not such an extreme anarchist as our friend Mitchell, his positions are considered favorable to that "philosophy."—ED. T. S.]

Editorial Notes.

THE Methodist preachers of Philadelphia hav already shown their bigotry by adopting a resolution asking the authorities of the New Orleans Exposition to keep the gates closed on Sundays. Probably they wish to junket through the grounds themselvs on Sundays and do not want a crowd.

BESIDES Sir John A. Macdonald, premier of Canada, and John W. Foster, American minister to Spain, the steamer Oregon brought to our shores last Sunday Mrs. Watts, wife of the first vice-president of the National Liberal League, who has come over to giv aid and comfort to her husband while he is helping fight our battle.

THE Salamanca Convention was opened Thursday evening by a speech from Charles Watts. Friday afternoon Mr. Reynolds lectured. Mr. Wakeman spoke on Sunday night. J. H. Burnham and S. P. Putnam were also there. Messrs. Remsburg and Bell were unable to attend. On the opening night a good audience was on hand. The rest of the time a drenching rain kept the people away. Only a few attended from abroad, and the convention was a failure. We shall hav a report next week.

To an unprejudiced person it would seem that a minister who knew of theaters only from the show bills was hardly the proper individual to criticise the drama. Yet the Rev. A. B. Rossiter boldly attempted such criticism last Sunday. "I know theaters," he said, "only through the play bill which I see displayed about in the shop windows and by the comments of the newspapers, and I judge that they are given up entirely to displays of seduction, adultery, murder, false marriage vows, and blasphemy; and while New York spends $7,000,000 each year to spread such knowledge, she spends but $3,000,000 on the gospel." If Mr. Rossiter's figures are correct the people of this city are more sensible than we thought them. But three million dollars, even, is a big sum to waste.

REMEMBER the poor! Father Hacker's crop of grapes and berries came very short this year, and he will receive no profit from his bees until next summer. Meanwhile he must suffer during the cold weather if aid be not extended. In acknowledging the receipt of sums sent through THE TRUTH SEEKER a few days ago, Mr. Hacker said that he was out of coal, nearly out of food, and slightly in debt. This is a bad condition to be in in Christian New Jersey, and we hope the generous-hearted will bear it in mind. The advanced age of Mr. Hacker and his wife, and their chronic invalidism, make it extremely hard for them to help themselvs. Let us, therefore, all turn to and help them. Address J. Hacker, Berlin, New Jersey.

THE St. Louis Globe-Democrat is responsible for this story about Col. Ingersoll: "While ex-Senator Dorsey was here in attendance on the Cattle Convention, he was asked one day how much he paid Bob Ingersoll for his defense in the Star route trials. 'Well,' said he, 'it was very curious how that was done. From the beginning to the end of the trial Ingersoll never asked me for a dollar. One day, after I had been acquitted on the second trial, I met Ingersoll, and I asked him how much I owed him. He at first declined to talk about it, saying he had no charge to make, and he didn't care if he never got a cent. I asked him to walk a few squares with me, and we went to the safe-deposit building. I unlocked my box and took out a four per cent government bond for $100,000 and gave it to him. He put it in his pocket and we walked away, and have not referred to the subject since.'"

SPEAKING of the prominent part the clergy hav played in our late "presidential scuffle," the San Franciscan says: "There is a prejudice in the minds of most American citizens against the interference of clergymen in the politics of the country. The world had a long and wearing fight ere it succeeded in making the church understand that the state could manage to struggle along without the church's direction. This prejudice is offended when clergymen, as clergymen, push themselvs to the front in politics, and speak in an oracular tone about matters of which they necessarily know no more than other people. We dislike to see them do it. The church has a load to carry in these unbelieving days that is heavy enough already. When the vanity of her commissioned servants leads them into presumptuous conduct that excites unnecessarily the resentment of the masses of the people who are not of the household of faith, in self-defense she should issue an order that her ministers mind their own proper business.'

THE vote in Washington territory on taxing church property shows a large majority in favor of such taxation. At the recent election the women of the territory cast about 11,000 votes. This settles the current idea that women will not vote when they hav the right to vote. It is also a straw to show that they favor the demand of Secularism that church property pay its share of the taxes.

"AN English traveler" calls attention in the columns of an English religious paper to the energetic propaganda of Freethought now being carried on in Italy. He finds large quantities of Freethought tracts on the tables of hotels, and says: "I hav seen not only the scholarly though dangerous pamphlets published by the late Thomas Scott, but also the more blasphemous tracts of the National Secular Society and journals like the National Reformer and Freethinker selling openly in the streets of Florence. Let it not be supposed that these soul-endangering publications are all printed in the English tongue, and therefore unintelligible for the mass of Italian readers; many are translations of the works above mentioned, or original works, written in Italian by the same person—apparently an Englishman—who is occupied in a translation of this Infidel literature, and who, it must be owned, displays a zeal and intelligence in the prosecution of his unholy task worthy of a better cause."

AUSTRALASIA is in luck. Our old friend Dr. J. L, York sails for that land on the 20th inst., intending to spend a few months there lecturing on the principles of Freethought. Australia has already many splendid advocates of reason and justice, but in Dr. York they will find a co-worker who will put them on their mettle to excel. His labors on the Pacific slope during the past seventeen years hav resulted in largely Liberalizing the country west of the Rockies. In whatever town he has gone into for lecturing he has left some Liberals behind, to make his second visit easier, and if he works as hard in Australia, our contemporaries there are bound to hav occasion for rejoicing. Upon his return the doctor intends to come East, where he will receive the warmest kind of welcome. In the mean time, though we can but regret his absence, we must giv him our goodspeeds. Our loss is Australasia's gain. Into thy hands, therefore, O Secularists of Australia and New Zealand, we commend our friend. Keep him busy, giv him audiences meet for his eloquence, and return him to us safe and sound. We hav use for him for several years yet.

THE Catholic Union and Times in commenting upon the recent assault upon the ex-priest Chiniquy in Montreal, likens him to the "notorious Edith O'Gorman," and says:

"Now, whether in their early harmful days, or in their castaway decay, there is but one course for Catholics to pursue toward those unfortunate creatures; and that is to giv them no notice whatever. The very thing they crave is notoriety. The more of that they can obtain, the better for them. It is a needed advertisment; and all the more valuable if it be illustrated with cuts and bruises. So when they meet with no opposition from Catholics who seem altogether oblivious of their existence, they are like breezeless barks that can descry no port for their decayed cargoes.

"We therefore regard the action of those who recently interfered with Chiniquy, while lecturing in Montreal, not only as foolish, but as highly reprehensible. The day has long since gone when men of the Chiniquy stamp could work mischief."

The inference to be drawn from this last paragraph is that if Chiniquy could work mischief to the church, then the Catholics would be justified in closing his month by violent means. This is in keeping with Capel's definition of toleration, and may be taken as the real sentiment of the church.

THE following from the World of this city will be of interest to our readers who remember the quaint little verses signed Charles Bradley which used to appear in our poet's column. We had lost sight of Mr. Bradley for several years: "Charles Bradley, a well-known and eccentric character, fell dead yesterday in a barber shop at No. 351 Bowery. He was seventy-four years old. But little could be learned of his history beyond that he was a nativ of Massachusetts and a graduate of Harvard. During the gold excitement of 1849 he went to California, where he resided long enough to become a judge of one of the civil courts. Sometimes he wrote poetry of considerable merit, which was published in a paper called THE TRUTH SEEKER. His tall, bent figure, pale, thoughtful face, and white beard were familiar along the Bowery and the adjacent streets. In cold weather he wore a soft black hat and a threadbare, faded cape of a semi-military cut. With the children he was extremely popular, as he was always ready to part with his small change. Lately, it is said, an elder sister died, and left him a legacy upon which he lived. He was in the habit of visiting the barber shop where he died, every day, to look at the papers. He was playing with the barber's child when he fell dead."

IN printing Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on "What Must We Do to Be Saved?" the Carrier Dove, a Spiritual paper of Oakland, Cal., takes occasion to say: "Some of our readers may ask why we publish an 'Infidel lecture' instead of a purely spiritual one, such as Mrs. E. L. Watson's. Our reply is this: We regard Col. Ingersoll as a John the Baptist who is preparing the way for the true Christ—Spiritualism. And before this new spiritual temple can be erected, the old, moss-grown, tumble-down structure of superstition must be removed, and the angel world has selected the right man to do it, but we must all help according to our abilities. If, by the perusal of this lecture, one ray of light shall dawn upon the creed-darkened consciousness of a single individual, or the scales be removed from any eyes now blinded by superstitious fears, preparing them for the reception of higher truths and the influx of the clear light of heaven, we shall feel repaid." Putting him in the light of a new John the Baptist preparing the way for a new Christ—and that Christ Spiritualism—will, we think, strike the colonel as a good joke. Of all the criticisms and eulogiums that hav been passed upon him, this is the most novel. However, as the Carrier Dove is evidently no sacrificial pigeon intended for the altar of a Jewish God, the editoress may be forgiven for her rather infelicitious figure of speech. She is doing a good work in spreading such literature. Long may the Carrier Dove bear missivs so potent!

W. A. CROFFUT is full of reminiscences of stenographers. In Sunday's World he givs the genesis of phonography in this country. "I suppose," he says, "that Stephen Pearl Andrews is entitled to more credit for it than anybody else. In 1840 the independence of Texas was acknowledged by England and France, and some slaves were introduced. This excited the Abolitionists of the North, and, among the projects for preventing it, some wealthy men, like Gerrit Smith, Lewis Tappan, Brisbane, and others, held a meeting about 1843, in New York, where a project was matured to sell Texas to Great Britain. Mr. Andrews, a Southerner, who had been an Abolitionist lawyer in New Orleans and knew Texas, had a more feasible scheme: to induce England to advance the money with which to buy and emancipate all of the slaves then in Texas, on condition of the passage of a law declaring Texas thenceforth free. He sought and obtained the co-operation of the Tappans and others, and went to Great Britain, filled with enthusiasm for a project for freeing the slaves of a state from which he had been expelled by a mob. He was cordially received by Lord John Russell and Palmerston, and the offer was considered with much favor for a time. But England was tardy; she temporized; and while she held the tempting morsel on her fork, wondering whether she had better swallow it, the 'Slavocrats' grabbed Texas and made it their own in 1845. After the Abolitionists' project had failed and Andrews had made one of his last speeches in England and was leaving the platform, a stranger pressed into his hand a roll of printed matter, merely saying, 'Look it over carefully.' He jammed the parcel into his pocket, found it when he had got on the ship, studied it on the way home, and prepared the text-books printed that same year—the first phonographic manual in America. That's how it all happened." That phonography is conduciv to longevity he thinks is shown by the lingering on the stage of the old-time reporters, the names of some of whom he cites; and among them our readers will recognize some of the best of Freethought writers. Beginning with Mr. Andrews, he comes along to T. C Leland, the ex-secretary of the League; W. H. Burr, of Washington, well known for his extensiv antiquarian research; D. L Scott-Browne, not known to fame, but who neglects the means of grace; Ned Underhill, who is in the same boat with Scott-Browne; and Henry M. Parkhurst, a radical of the most pronounced type. Whether the practice of phonography givs long life or not, it certainly produces a good crop of heretics.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL lectures in Menomonie, Wis., Dec. 14th, 16th, and 18th, at Concert Hall.

W. F. JAMIESON commenced his course of lectures in Mitchell, Dakota, Sunday evening, Nov. 30th. A preacher spoke at the close of the address, and said that, although he could not agree with the speaker in his views of religion, good would be done by such lectures in making people think.

THE second course of the Westbrook Free Lectureship began on Sunday evening, Dec. 7th, at City Institute, Chestnut and Eighteenth streets, Philadelphia. The general object of these lectures, it is announced, is to "check Infidelity and to promote true religion and sound morality." The general subject is "Christianity: What and Whence?" The topics for particular evenings can be learned from the Saturday papers of the city. Mr. Westbrook is a Rationalistic Theist. He is also a joker, if we may judge of his public announcements as compared with his public actions. His lectures are to "check Infidelity," but when Messrs. Watts and Putnam visited his city he handed in ten dollars to help the League, which may be a very good way to check infidelity to truth, but not Infidelity to Christianity. And if Mr. Westbrook's lectures on "Christianity: What and Whence?" bear any resemblance to his "Bible: Whence and What?" Christianity is not likely to get much good out of them, for his book is a knock-down argument against the claims of the Bible. Judge Westbrook is fully as much an Infidel as ever Thomas Paine was; and, when not endeavoring to establish Theism, is as much a Liberal as Col. Ingersoll himself. He is a genial, courteous, scholarly gentleman, and so no one can hear or read him and fail to learn something.

THE Stewartsville Investigator, a religious paper published in the town in which Mr. Remsburg debated the New Testament with a Rev. Mr. Rowley, is publishing the discussion in full. In announcing the report, it takes occasion to say that "while we are fully persuaded that no force of argument will avail to open the eyes of any to the grandeur and the simplicity of the truths that hav been vindicated in this interesting discussion, and well knowing that this is part of that knowledge which no man can communicate to his neighbor, we yet believe that it will at once be seen that the questions which hav been discussed between Messrs. Rowley and Remsburg served not only as a 'recreation for many,' and were not only 'a pleasing break in the usual monotony,' but really possess an interest of no local or passing character. And we therefore hope that this remarkable discussion will be read attentivly, and with some profit, at least, by every reader of the Investigator. The discussion throughout has been very fairly conducted by both the disputants, and it must generally be acknowledged that each of them has represented his side of the question in an able, earnest, and most gentlemanly manner, which had a very pleasing effect upon the audience." In a card to the public, in which he explains that he was unable to meet some points raised by Mr. Remsburg, the Rev. Mr. Rowley bears testimony to the good qualities of our champion. "I will here state," he says, "that Mr. Remsburg treated me in the most gentlemanly manner throughout the discussion, and that he acquitted himself in a manly way." Although the debate is published in a slightly imperfect manner in the Stewartsville paper, the substance of the points brought out by both men can be obtained by writing, inclosing, we should judge, about a quarter, to the Investigator, Stewartsville, Mo.

Letters from Friends.

THE LAND QUESTION.

BERLIN, N. J., Nov. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Forty years ago, after having lectured more or less in the Liberal cause for twenty years, the writer of this started a reform paper in Portland, Me., which he published seventeen years.

Maine at that time had large tracts of wild land that she was giving away to churches, schools, and colleges, while thousands of her families had not an acre on which to raise food. Without the aid of any other paper than my own, I put a stop to all that, and got a law enacted to giv every landless man who would cultivate it a farm lot for only fifty cents an acre, all to be paid in labor, making their own roads—the same as free.

I am told that hundreds of families now own good farms there, scores of whom never would hav owned an acre if I had not got that law. When Henry Evans started his paper, Young America, in New York, which was wholly devoted to land reform, I did what I could to help him, Lewis Masquerier, and a few others to get enacted the national homestead law, under which thousands more hav good farms. And now, after all this benefit from these laws that I labored so hard to obtain, while living on but one or two meals a day, along comes an Englishman, styling himself G. W. Chapman, M.D., of Kansas, telling the world, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, that Hacker knows no more about the land question than a horse does about astronomy.

His first article against free land for all appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER some months ago. In that he confesses that, though a foreigner, he had taken all the advantages of the very law that I holped to secure, but says if he had to go over the ground again he would buy an improved farm instead of taking wild land. Very childish for a learned doctor! In the first place, not one in a thousand who wants land and a home has anything to buy an improved farm, and in the next place, there are not improved farms enough for sale to supply one in a thousand of those who need them. Every man has just the same right to land enough to raise his food on that he has to sunlight, air, water, or to life itself, and it is a mystery to me how anyone can oppose this right unless he is actuated by selfish motivs. Is Dr. Chapman an agent for the English lords who are buying ten, twenty, and fifty thousand acre lots here, on which to establish the same system of landlordism that has pauperized Ireland? He is not satisfied with his English brethren owning a million acres of land here, on which to sustain those from whom the land was stolen, but in one of his later letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER he has started the question whether it would not be better to abolish all taxes on property and tax the person. He seems to want the laborer who livs in a hired rat-hole and works for a dollar a day to pay as much tax as the English lord with his million acres. In one of his letters he offers to giv me as much land as I can cultivate if I will go to Kansas. Very childish again for a doctor. As though giving a man eighty-three years old as much land as he could cultivate would restore to the homeless millions the land they hav been robbed of! There are many other things in the doctor's letters that I would like to notice, were it not for trespassing too much on your space, but one thing more and I will close.

Some months ago, one of my friends, without my knowledge, appealed to some of his and my friends to purchase bees for me, thinking that, if I should liv a year or two longer, I might receive some support from them. He received a part, but not the whole, of the sum he asked for, whereupon Dr. Chapman came out in THE TRUTH SEEKER, giving the Liberals a real thrashing for their "stinginess" toward me, when the fact is they hav been generous and kind, and I should be ungrateful if I let the doctor's charge go unnoticed. Since my health failed, three or four years since, more than half our fuel, and food, and what clothing we hav had, has been bought with money sent us by Infidels, a few Spiritualists, and other Liberals, many of whom we never heard of before, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and several other Liberal papers hav kindly noticed our case, for all of which favors we are truly grateful; and we hope the doctor will not scold the Liberals again till he knows what he is writing about. He undoubtedly means well, but does not appear to understand any of the subjects on which he has written. J. HACKER.

ELMINA TO HANNAH, PINNEY, AND OTHERS.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Dec. 1, 1884.

DEAR FRIENDS: To answer all the kindly criticisms on what I hav written concerning my trip North to see something of Spiritualism, would fill THE TRUTH SEEKER full, and leave no space for other and, perhaps, more important matter. So you will please accept this as my excuse for omitting to notice many points I would like to reply to. To friend Hannah, I would say that her letter is very interesting, giving, as it does, a phase of hallucination that is so nearly like reality as to deceive the most critical investigator. I know the phantom child was as actual a presence to her as if it had been flesh and blood instead of a mere mental delusion (as I believe it to hav been). Reason and common sense tell us that if one child could thus be restored to its mother's arms, thousands would be so. Other mothers hav suffered as keenly, and felt as desolately bereft as Hannah, but no little form came back to fill the void and soothe the pain.

I well remember how I felt during the war, when my little Lillian took the croup and died. I missed her day and night even as Hannah did her baby. And added to the loss came the news that the regiment my husband was in was all cut to pieces, and I had no news from him for long dreary waiting weeks. My father just then died of consumption, and his only sister of dropsy, and my sole remaining child had chronic croup for six weeks straight ahead. But out of all this void nothing from the beyond ever came to giv me peace or hope. Only time, with its gentle healing, brought relief.

As to slate-writing, she says, "Only the owners of those slates knew there was no fraud." That may be true. I know of several instances where slates hav been taken by the owners who wrote on them before hand, and then covered the side with pasteboard, or in other ways, and the medium would go through the performance; the scratching of the pencil be heard and finally the medium would say the message was complete, and the slates would be opened and read, and the whole would go into history as a genuin spirit test. You may ask, "But why do this?" It has been done as a test by persons who felt a distrust of a certain medium, and by others out of a pure spirit of mischief, and others still did it to get at bed-rock facts.

When I know of prepared pencils that make writing which does not become visible till after a certain time, and know of numerous ways by which the writing can be done by trick, is it a wonder if I question spirit-power in any of it?

You will say, "The counterfeit proves there is a genuin." But I say these shams are not counterfeits, but are real frauds and tricks.

Chinese and other heathen gods are not counterfeits, proving a real God; they are nothing but images of a fiction and a myth, just as the devil is, as fairies are, and as dragons are. Where there is no genuin there can be no counterfeit, and if there is no real medium or real spirit, those you denounce as counterfeits are not such.

I do not pretend to explain the strange event that Hannah relates, nor do I think anyone will win the mineral claim any more than they will win Truesdell's five hundred dollars by producing spirit-writing in his presence. As the man said in court, "You hav brought three witnesses who saw the crime committed. Well, I can bring three hundred who did not see it."

Anderson's "facts," to say the least, are curious and interesting. There is a peculiar sympathy between certain persons that may, in rare cases, be so perfect as to produce the effects there narrated. But if this be true, it does not prove spirit existence.

Friend Pinney is somewhat hard. I went with as little prejudice as possible. I was really disappointed that I found so little. I expected marvels, and saw mere nothings. He complains that Truesdell was allowed to handle the slates. Could a man do his sleight-of-hand tricks at any show, and not handle his materials? Truesdell told us all plainly that it was a trick. When I asked Joe Caffray if I might mark my slates, he said, "No." When I asked if I might keep them in sight all the time, he said, "No." He said he might hav to put them on top of my head, under my feet, on my shoulder, or under the table, and sharply exclaimed, "What makes you so suspicious?" I knew then I should hav no fair test. I knew his maneuvering meant a chance to exchange the slates, which he did do, for I did mark them when he was not looking. Now Caffray's advertisment was sent me by the Banner of Light, and by several prominent Spiritualists, as one of their best mediums. Since then I hav learned his true history, which I will sometime giv you.

Why do I believe Truesdell? because I hav never caught him telling me an untruth or the shadow of one. Because his neighbors and all his business associates giv him the highest recommendation there just where he has lived ever since the advent of Spiritualism as a new religion.

Why did I go to Syracuse? Because I found nothing worth noticing anywhere else; and Truesdell offered to pay my way there, and giv me a home, and introduce me to mediums there and giv me a true history of his twenty-five years' investigation in which he has spent over two thousand dollars getting at "Bottom Facts." While I was there I saw a letter written him by a prominent medium asking him to develop him further. In plain words, saying the old tricks failed to draw well and he wanted Truesdell to giv him some new ones. I hav the broadest charity for those who really believe, who hav had experiences such as Hannah relates, but if she will read Dr. Hallock's "Nerves and the Nervous," she will find things just as wonderful resulting from deranged and diseased nerves. I do not expect to kill Spiritualism by exposing a few frauds. Just see the millions of dollars, the ages of time, the mass of brain work that has been expended in trying to kill the old Bible and prove Christianity a myth, and yet there are even now myriads of real believers in these frauds, and will be for ages to come.

We hav nailed no end of pious lies against Paine, Voltaire, and Ingersoll, and yet again and again they crop up as fresh as ever. Just so with spirits of the dead. We may lay them over and over and show up the inconsistencies, but all cannot see alike and some will be compelled to believe while others cannot, however hard they try.

I hope friends will not doubt my honesty and my desire for truth, however we may differ as to what is fact and what is not, or as to the causes of what is. If any one who has furnished money for my trip feels that I hav failed to use it satisfactorily, I am ready to refund it at call. But thus far every response from donators has been that they were "well satisfied."

Earnestly and truly, ELMINA.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of August 2d appeared an article entitled, "Prohibitory and Sumptuary," signed by E. C. Walker, to which I hope you may find room for this brief reply.

At the January term, 1847, of the Supreme Court of the United States, the following cases came up for argument on appeal: Samuel Thurlow, plaintiff in error, against the Commonwealth of Mass.; Jacob Fletcher, plaintiff in error, against the State of Rhode Island; Andrew Pierce, Jr., and Thomas Pierce, plaintiffs in error, against the State of New Hampshire.

Each of the plaintiffs in error was indicted for selling liquor without a license. The cases were brought up from the state courts. The points raised in each case were substantially the same, and the arguments and decisions in each case were substantially the same The justices sitting, all of whom rendered opinions, were Chief Justice Taney, Justice McLean, Catron, Daniel Woodbury and Grier. A majority of those were Democrats; and Chief Justice Taney, who wrote the leading opinion, was a Jacksonian Democrat of the strictest sort.

The counsel who appeared for the plaintiffs were distinguished all over the world for their great learning and eloquence. It is to be presumed that no argument or precedent would escape the observation of such men as Rufus Choate and Daniel Webster. Such men as these were not men for quibbles. They assumed the broad ground that a state had no constitutional right to "prohibit, restrain, control, or prevent" the sale, by retail or otherwise, of imported spirituous liquors. It seemed to be conceded by these distinguished counsel that if the spirituous liquors were manufactured within the state, or had not paid an import duty to the government, then there was no doubt the state had a right to prohibit, etc. But if, on the other hand, the importer paid a duty to the government, then such payment carried with it the right to sell, and any law preventing the exercise of such right was unconstitutional. That these distinguished counsel presented every argument with all possible force cannot be doubted. Never before or since in this country hav lawyers of greater ability appeared to represent any case, and the decision of the court then rendered has stood unquestioned as the supreme law of the land from that day, thirty-seven years ago, till the present. The following extracts from the opinions of these judges, it will be observed, emphatically settles the question then at issue. Chief Justice Taney says: "If any state deems the retail and traffic in ardent spirits injurious to its citizens, and calculated to produce idleness, vice, or debauchery, I see nothing in the Constitution of the United States to prevent it from regulating or restraining the traffic, or from prohibiting it altogether."

Justice McLean said: "A license to sell is a matter of police and revenue within the power of the state. If the foreign article be injurious to the health and morals of the community, a state may prohibit the sale of it. No one can claim a license to retail spirits as a matter of right."

Justice Catron said: "If the state has the power of restraint by license to any extent, she may go to the extent of prohibiting the sales altogether."

Justice Grier said: "It is not necessary to array the appalling statistics of misery, pauperism, and crime which hav their origin in the use and abuse of ardent spirits. The police power, which is exclusivly in the state, is competent to the correction of these great evils, and all measures of restraint or prohibition necessary to effect that purpose are within that authority. And if a loss of revenue should accrue to the United States from a diminished consumption of ardent spirits, she will be the gainer a thousand-fold in the health, wealth, and happiness of the people."

Such is the law of the United States, and such has been declared the law of every state where the question of the constitutionality of prohibition has ever been submitted.

It did not occur to these distinguished counsel, or to the court, that laws restricting or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors were sumptuary, and, therefore, unconstitutional. The very idea of government excludes the idea that any man has the right of "personal liberty" to engage in any business which produces misery, pauperism, and crime. It is absurd to say that government may not prevent the sale of bad meat or opium, because the personal liberty of the citizen to buy and eat would be interfered with. The right to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors is based upon the fact that such sale produces appalling evil results, which must be suffered by those who neither sell nor drink. It is absurd to say that any state may not put a stop to any business which produces three-fourths of its crime and pauperism. If this article of Mr. Walker represents the drift of the truth seekers now, the sooner they are put in strait-jackets the better for the rational liberties of the American people. GEO. BABCOCK.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, Nov. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am at home again from the mountains and I see by the tab that the time is drawing near for me to remit, so I inclose $2 on my subscription. Well, I must tell you I received the lithograph of D. M. Bennett's monument all right and in good condition, but hav not got it framed yet. I must say it is a nice picture, and the likeness of Mr. Bennett is good, as I hav his photograph card, i. e. "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." I will tell you a little incident. I wrote at that time to Mr. Bennett to send me the carte de visite of "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." Well, it came by return mail, and I was sorry to see the glaze of the card got cracked a little, and I wrote to Mr. Bennett and told him I had received it all right, but was sorry to see the glaze cracked a little. Well, to my surprise, the next mail brought me another card of the same and in good condition, and, "bet yer life," I'm going to keep it.

Well, Mr. Editor, I think you will hav to scare up Jo Cook and Talmage, and other noted divines, and put Tony Comstock at their head, and send them of to New South Wales, forthwith, for the clergy of that place are having an awful time there with the ungodly heretics, what with Mr. Charles Bright and his intelligent wife, and Mr. Gerald Massey, Thomas Walker; and now they hav another awful fellow from England, Mr. Joseph Symes, he has scared the holy clergy of Melbourne almost out of their wits. Charles Bright calls it the Melbourne scare. In the Sydney Liberal here, this Mr. Symes has got out this advertisment, "Lost, the Christian Heaven, and any person that can discover it will be handsomely rewarded," and he offers to go lecturing through the world and take up subscriptions at each lecture to reward the discovery of the Christian heaven; and he wants the real facts, and if they can be produced he thinks he would not lecture two weeks before he would hav more money than he would know what to do with. So you see there is a chance for Jo Cook and witty Talmage, or any other theological priestly cuss. I hav not the time at present to say much about this Utah bomination and its infernal beastly outfit, but Uncle Sam has convicted two filthy scoundrels of late, one for four years with a fine of $800; and the other for three years and six months, with a fine of $500, and I hope they will convict more of the lecherous rascals. I am glad we hav a true and loyal governor in the person of Mr. Murray, also a true and loyal judge in the person of Mr. Lane; and I hope the United States laws will be put in full force here as elsewhere, and let justice hav its true and proper demands by giving this Mormon outfit a lesson they will not be apt to forget.

I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Chainey is wriggling out at the small end of the horn, and that his Secularism is not of much account. I cannot see why Materialists and Spiritualists should be out of sorts with each other; if we, the family of humanity, will continue to exist in the great hereafter, it will be in accordance with nature's immutable laws and her divine forces, and if there is no hereafter for us, then it appears to me that nature is a failure. I could say a little more on this, but I hav not the time and space.

Please send me the pamphlet, "The Gods of Superstition, and the God of the Universe," by D. M. Bennett.

Yours for the truth, WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 26, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Having changed my place of business, and playing ten performances per week in a theater, I hav not had the time I would like to devote to our great cause, but what there is is utilized in trying to stir up thought. I go the rounds of the churches, and when I think I hav discovered an intellectual light, then comes the desire for "close communion" of thought, then the endeavor to "press home" some of the fruits of Freethought.

To be fair with the Christians, I wish to giv them credit for any progress made. One Episcopal shepherd admits to his flock that he can't think God is omnipotent while evil is in existence. He says, "God is good, and don't want sin in the world, but the presence of evil shows obstacles over which he has no control"—one step.

I send inclosed a report of a sermon delivered by a Unitarian minister, which speaks him far in advance of most of the pulpiteers. You may think it worth publishing in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

As soon as I can spare something I shall send Brother Putnam my mite toward the campaign fund. The Spiritualists are progressing finely here, and, though not one myself, I am in sympathy with their Liberal tendencies. I heard George Chainey last Sunday, twice, "Why and how I became a Spiritualist," and, "The Ideal Man and Woman." I think he is eloquent and honest. W. P. BLYTHE.

READING, KAN., Nov. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I write to tell you that we hav been fortunate enough in the little town of Reading to hav a series of Liberal lectures, and to tell you under what adverse circumstances. In the first place the consent of two of the school board was obtained for the use of the school-house, and Mr. O. A. Phelps, of Colorado, was engaged to lecture. He came and delivered a splendid lecture. All went well until the appearance of the other member of the board, one of those wonderfully pious fellows that always appear to be bursting with piety. This one was so full of it that, after listening a few minutes to the lecture, he fairly frothed at the mouth. Well, to cut a long story short, he insisted that the house should not be used for such a purpose, and persuaded one of the board whose consent had been obtained to say we should not hav the house again. Well, the result was, there was a store building nearly finished that belonged to a Liberal, and they soon rented it, obtained an organ, and the lectures were continued with success, notwithstanding there was a revival in the Methodist church, and there were many people "coming to Christ." If you know what that is or see any sense in it, all right—I am only giving you their words. I attended several nights, and all I could see was that a few weak-minded people, and some that had got so untrustworthy that no one hardly respected them, would get up and say they were determined to "liv for Christ." As far as I am concerned, I propose to liv for myself and friends. But, lo! what a change in the manner of the church people toward one of them after thus signifying their wish to be led around by the nose, as it were, by older sinners—excuse the expression, but they themselvs say they are sinners. As soon as they signify their willingness to be one of them, they are taken right into their hypocritical arms and feasted and cajoled, and asked, "Now, don't you know something about some of those outsiders that you can be witness to? This is one of your first duties as a Christian to help pull down one of these Liberals. Never mind if he has befriended you in your poverty. In fact, it was not him really that did it, it was 'providence.'" The result is that they set what little mind they hav got to work to think of some way they can injure some of their old friends. In spite of the church people saying what Mr. Phelps said was an insult to Christianity, I am satisfied it saved at least two or three of the young people that were getting into their clutches from the bondage of orthodoxy. And even that was worth all the trouble and expense of securing the lectures. Mr. Phelps is an eloquent speaker, of pleasing manner, and a great thinker. No one, it would seem to me, could listen to his reasoning without being impressed with his true statement of facts and the reasonableness of his views. I hav been a natural Freethinker and Materialist all my life, but hav not been very outspoken until since reading the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. I am only sorry I did not become acquainted with it sooner. It is a perfect mine of reason—and speaking of reason reminds me of what the revivalist here insisted on every night through his meetings. He says, "Now, my dear friends, some of you say you can't believe and come to Christ; you are not constituted so that you can bring your reason to think that you can be a Christian. Now, my dear hearers, let me impress it upon you that you don't need to use your reason. But just say, 'I'll come to Christ.'" Now, isn't it a fact that if he really believed what he preached himself, he would hav insisted that they reason the matter themselvs. But no, they don't believe it themselvs, and reason is their greatest enemy. Well, after seeing the number that rose to their feet, I made up my mind that they either heeded him and did not use their reason, or else did not hav any to use. I will just say that he did not labor with me long to come to Christ. He came to where a Liberal friend and myself sat, and said, "Now, my dear ladies"—they always say "dear ladies," you know—"if there is anything we can do for you, we would be very happy to do it." I replied, "If there is, I'll certainly let you know." He says, "Don't you feel as though you needed Christ?" "No, sir," we both replied. "God help you," he groaned, and passed on. My husband says it was a polite way he had of telling us to go to hell. However, I would advise him to make one before sending anyone there. MRS. MARY E. PENFIELD.

OCONOMOWOC, Nov., 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I thank you for the information I got by your answer to Mr. J. Anthony, referring to phallicism. Certainly your knowledge of it seems to be superior to that of Mr. Anthony. The simplest mind must admit that a rite tending to irritate our sensual passions, which we hav in common with the beast, must be harmful and degrading.

I also read with great pleasure Mr. Harrison's defense of his Positivism. I prefer it to Agnosticism, and most certainly to the orthodox Positivism of a personal God, his heaven, and hell, and the devil. In my consideration, mankind is the true representativ of goodness and badness, or God and Satan. Mr Harrison's controversy with Spencer is similar to that of Haeckel versus Virchow. I am more and more pleased with the contents of your paper, and feel satisfied that Man, the organ of the League, fell into such good hands. I will certainly continue to read your paper and pay for it.

STEWARTSVILLE, Mo., Dec. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Our priest-ridden and godly town of Stewartsville has just been waked out of a deep sleep by J. E. Remsburg, who came here to meet Rev. Rowley in a debate on the New Testament. These people hav had it all their own way so long, and hav put so much confidence in their sky pilots, the preachers, that they hav become so bigoted and unreasonable that they would do as they did in old times—kill and burn at the stake all who do not believe as they do. To say that Mr. Remsburg's arguments astonished the natives would hardly express it. Some of God's people are very much excited, and say I had better quit getting those blasphemers to come here to demoralize the people; but I tell them I am no quitter. I am on the war-path, fighting against all that is wrong and unreasonable and unjust in any way. If that kind of doctrin is bad, I am a bad man, and must remain so to the end.

Inclosed please find the Investigator, one of our city papers, with the arguments of both sides. S. N. BRADFORD.

GALESBURG, ILL., Nov. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: After some delay I send you $3 to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER. No apology for neglect only the want of funds and pressure of business.

I see heavy charges against the Ex-Rev. George Chainey for leaving the peaceable ranks of the Materialists, who are at war and on fighting terms with the rest of mankind. It is claimed Mr. Chainey did wrong in giving his reasons publicly for his change of mind; also in challenging some of his accusers to meet him face to face, so as to defend his expressed reasons which caused the change. As to the first charge, no one having common sense is expected to change their mind without cause and reason, and Liberalism givs him and all others the right not only to change their minds, but to giv the cause and reasons, both public and private, as was done by W. F. Jamieson when he left the Spiritualists' ranks, and fell into the ranks of the Materialists. He gave his reasons publicly, and challenged the Spiritual world to meet him in debate, insinuating that they were deluded dupes and dishonest tricksters, and when his challenge was accepted, and conditions proposed, he replied (these are his words), "The Spiritualists are like Henry Ward Beecher's friends—a pack of damn fools, and more intolerant than Christians were." In all this no fault was found by a Materialist against Mr. Jamieson's personal charges, and his reply was suppressed and refused publication, and the matter was passed over under the friendly advice of D. M. Bennett. In this case the other man's ox was gored. But in Mr. Chainey's case, Mr. Jamieson has fully redeemed himself by granting Mr. Chainey the same privilege he himself exercised when he withdrew from the Spiritual ranks. Let us balance our books. This is honorable in Mr. Jamieson, and fully atones for the wound he made the Spiritualists. Therefore I throw no personal reflections, and only name the case to show the difference it makes whose ox is gored.

I would advise Brother Chainey and Brother Watts, if possible, to take each other by the hand and say, "We will drop this matter so far as personality is concerned." As Freethinkers, no man should belittle another, or speak disrespectfully of his brother man's person for difference of opinion, yet hold sacred the right to combat error though it may be in himself. As a community of Liberals, we are bound to tolerate—that is, bear with each other's opinions—but we are not bound to acquiesce in them.

Let the power that rules the universe forbid a division in the Liberal ranks such as took place in the once peaceable society of Friends, or Quakers; which had its origin in a personal dispute between Ann Bearthwait and Elias Hicks. Each held their friends and followers at the expense of sociability, and the harmony that once gave honor and respect to the Quakers was destroyed.

Referring to the departure of Rev. Collins of the Methodist Episcopal order under unfavorable charges (since seen in Canada), our Democratic press says that so many bank presidents, defaulters, and preachers going to Canada was the cause of Blaine losing his election. Others claim it was an especial act of Providence, and that God has rejected the Republican party and has given the ruling power of the nation to their enemies as a rebuke; therefore the will of the Lord was carried out in the result of the election. The same was claimed in the assassination of Garfield—an act of Providence, a rebuke from God; therefore the will of the Lord was carried out in each case. Yet Guiteau was hanged as a murderer, and the election in New York was carried by fraud. Who is able to reconcile such ideas, or who can tell what the Republicans had to thank God for on Thanksgiving Day?

MILWAUKEE, OR., Nov. 24, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: You will please notice within another greenback, which is intended to apply on our TRUTH SEEKER account.

Now about the gods that are spoken of so frequently in the papers. It seems as though they had been from Dan to Beersheba, and as yet not one track of any god except the old god Phallus has been discovered. Now the living God of the Israelites (not the house of Judah) was a oneness in spirit—so saith the book—that is, the spirits of all the universoleum of worlds as a oneness constituted this living God, and this is how that even an individual spirit was styled a god, and this is how he spoke through the mouths of his prophets.

Now the three-headed god seems to be leading people too far away from the truth. Paul calls it the godhead, and says we may all know the whole plan of the godhead. Then if we can all know it, it must be very simple—the father, son, and Holy Ghost. Paul did not hav reference to this soft-air holy ghost, for he says, "Ye are all the sons of God through which the spirit manifesteth." The word "ghost" is taken from guest, and meant a visiting spirit. This oneness in spirit—god—also the oneness in the sons of God, constituted the son of God. The same with Christ, for they were all individual Christs, and as a oneness they constituted the body of Christ. It was the mediumistic portion of humanity that it all has reference to. Christ is the church, saith Paul, showing that there was nothing belonged to the church but those that had a spiritual gift of some phase. God Phallus is the very foundation, bed-rock, and father of the living God.

CARTHAGE, Mo., Nov. 26, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I thought I would be able to renew promptly my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I hav been sick for three months and am "busted" flatter than Pharaoh was after Moses borrowed all his jewelry and "fixin's." During the long, tedious hours of my illness THE TRUTH SEEKER has been my chief mental food and consolation, and I don't want to be without it; but I cannot ask for trust unless you see fit. Stop it if you think best, yet you shall not lose one cent if you send it on, except I should pass up the "golden stairs," then you would hav to charge it up to the Lord in part payment of a harp when you join the angelic ministrels. Fifteen cents in cash would be a bonanza to me just now, and, alas! to-morrow is Thanksgiving and I hav no turkey—no, not even so much as a poor old frozen-toed rooster—to offer up as a burnt offering! Come to think of it, I believe the Lord is mad at me, or has an old grudge at me about something, from the way he neglects me. Yet we never had any "fuss" that I remember of. Really I am sorely puzzled to know what to return thanks for, and shall postpone it until God shows me more favors than he has of late. Oh, for a cyclone of manna! or, if it is all the same to him, I'll take mine in "flapjacks," with butter on.

My illness has, I fear, left me permanently disabled physically; yet I shall ask no aid from either Christians or Christianity, if I die in the gutter. I stand a poor chance to get a situation here, for I hav never pandered to party, place, or creed, and never will.

"No servil strain I'll teach my tongue
To win the ear of mighty ones;
Whate'er within my spirit burns,
High up is flung.
"Ay! though the power of earthly woe
Should crush my frame in agony,
My soul unbent, proud, stern, and free,
Would scorn the blow!"

Fraternally yours, WATSON HESTON.

PALMYRA, N. Y., Nov. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $2 to continue your paper to the undersigned.

Friend Macdonald, I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since its commencement, and it seems to me to improve with each issue. I feel that you deserve thus much from one who fully appreciates your efforts to continue the arduous labors of the lamented Bennett. H. M. NORTH.

MAMMOTH HOT SPRINGS, WY. T., Nov. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: There are so few people in the park now that the season for visitors is over, it would be best not to send more than one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The one addressed to me, an old subscription, will be enough.

The champions of two opposing systems, Ingersoll and Cook, hav visited the Yellowstone National Park, and if their systems are to be judged by the estimates made of the men by those who came in contact with them while making the tour of the park, theology would be condemned on account of the fruit it bears, while Infidelity would be blessed on account of the fruit it bears.

Ingersoll was welcomed everywhere. A beautiful boiling spring and terrace were named for him in honor of his visit. A beautiful geyser was christened "The Ingersoll," in the Upper Geyser basin.

Cook quarreled with one of the most quiet and peaceable of men, Justice M. E. Metcalf. He is most thoroughly detested for his insolence, selfishness, and quarrelsome disposition. He threatens to assail the park and all whom he encountered in it. If he does there are ten men whom he insulted and abused who will publish a statement of facts in regard to him that will effectually squelch the blatant demagog. I was the only one who had no difficulty with him, and I merely speak for the following gentlemen: George Graham, G. W. Marshal, M. E. Metcalf, Theoron Moran, T. McGuire, and others whom I could name. Yours truly, H. L. G.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Eyes.

Thoughtful eyes, pensiv eyes,
Soft and fair and calm as May;
Eyes as clear as summer skies,
Long-lashed, dreamy eyes are they.

Tearful eyes, pleading eyes,
Who, oh, who could say them nay?
Merry eyes, laughing eyes,
Changeful as an April day.

Happy eyes, smiling eyes,
Filled with pleasure, flashing blue;
Dancing eyes, sparkling eyes,
Eyes so pure, so deep in hue.

Oh, the dearest, bonniest eyes!
Of such eyes I know but two,
Wondering eyes, questioning eyes,
Tender, brave, steadfast, and true.

Earnest eyes, eager eyes,
Eloquent and deep and bright;
Starry eyes, darkling eyes,
Clear and radiant as moon-light.

What is sweeter than their glance?
What is mightier than their might?
Oh! bewildering, witching eyes!
My soul is filled with their blue light!

The Gentle Mule.

He was four feet high and seven feet long,
His hide was thi'k and his legs were strong;
He lived on hay and oats and grass,
And he sampled at times the garden "sass."

I rode him once like a knight of old,
A saddle and bit ablaze with gold,
A cane for a lance—and what beside,
I remember not since I took that ride.

It is, perhaps, but a childish dream,
In which things are not but rather seem,
For the air did whirl and seem to go round,
And I was pleased when I touched the ground.

I hav ridden since then on a railroad car,
And sailed in a boat through the harbor bar;
I hav been to court and church and school,
And yet I remember that gentle mule.

D. R. SHERIDAN.

Children's Tears.

The tears and griefs of children are looked upon by many as of no moment and worthy of little consideration, yet these are all the young heart well can bear, which a kind word or a gentle hand might hav soothed and wiped away.

Some years ago, I was stopping a few days with a lady who prided herself on her neatness and strict government of her children, even estimating all her lady friends and acquaintances by this one qualification, saying "she did not believe anyone was doing their duty by their children by letting them romp and play around in the dirt," glancing with pride towards her two children, a boy and girl, of eight and six years old, sitting demurely by her side, looking wistfully out of the windows, much like caged birds, wishing to be free.

A day or two after, as I was sitting by the window overlooking the sanded tennis-lawn, I beheld the two children busily playing in the sand. The boy had piled up ridges of the yielding sand, and was sticking into them small twigs of cedar, as he called out to his sister: "Come and see my mountains."

She looked up for a moment from her flower garden, where she had been putting some roses and pinks in little beds of sand, and said, "You must not put your trees on the tops of your mountains; you must leave them bare—don't you see?" pointing to some bald peaks in the distance.

Just at that moment was heard the shrill voice of their mother, calling out, "There you are, playing in the dirt again!" and down came her heavy hand upon their innocent heads, so full of ideal beauty, their joy turned to grief and they made to think they had done a wrong by obeying the laws of life and health. I will not repeat the base epithets she used as she drove the children into the house, and told them not to leave it again that day. Did that mother know she was tarnishing the moral nature of her children, that neither time nor tears could ever obliterate?

That children hav fine sensibilities will be seen in the following incident: Being one day at a neighbor's house when I was quite young, there came in a little girl, belonging to some very poor people in the place, and asked for a quart of milk to take home with her. The lady of the house gave her the milk, and also some bread and cheese to eat, as she knew her family were destitute. Just then her husband came in. He had been to town, and he had evidently been drinking, by his boisterous manner and coarse language, when, as he noticed the little girl eating, he said "he didn't propose to feed all the paupers of the land," with several vile epithets added, when the little pale-faced child stepped tremblingly to he table and laid up her bread and cheese, and hurried out of the house, refusing to take it again when urged by the woman to do so, saying, "No, ma'am, I don't want to eat it now."

To her poverty was added the bread of bitterness. Let all beware how they blot with sadness the pictures on the tablets of memory since these are to form the happy or sorrowful reflections of after-life, filling the mind with pleasure and high resolve, or darken and deaden its hopes and aspirations.

MRS. LUNA HUTCHINSON.

Two Marthas.

Martha Dandridge was a bright, handsome, wide awake girl, and lived in Virginia more than a hundred and fifty years ago. She did not hav the advantages of a good education, for, in her time, there were no free schools in the state in which she lived. It has been said that she could hardly write her name. But she learned to do all kinds of housework, and was taught, also, to spin yarn and to weave cloth. By and by she married, but was early left a widow with three children.

After awhile she met, at the house of a friend, a young military man, who was attracted by her bright, vivacious manners, her handsome face, and cheery conversation. It was a case of "love at first sight," and not long afterward she married this gentleman, who was none other than George Washington.

Her life was quite eventful after this, as she took a deep interest in public affairs with which her new husband was identified. She witnessed the siege and evacuation of Boston by the Brritish in the time of the Revolution.

During this war she made frequent visits to camp, and her arrival there was always considered a great event. The soldiers liked to see her among them, for her cheerfulness was inspiring. She said she heard the first cannon at the opening and the closing of the war. She was at Valley Forge in 1777-8, that fearful winter of distress and privation, when the outlook was dreary and direful. She was like an angel of mercy there, seeking out the poor and distressed ones, and relieving their needs as only the benevolent and kind can do.

Lady Washington she was called, and everybody respected her highly. But she lived, while in camp, in a log cabin. This was the headquarters of General Washington, and that hard winter above mentioned, they had little to eat or drink—salt herrings and potatoes, and these not plentiful, no tea, no coffee, only water, drank from tin cups. Their dishes were mostly of pewter, and the spoons they used were of horn. Those were troublous times, as you may believe—"the times that tried men's soul's," as they were never tried before.

Lady Washington dressed very plainly. Once when she visited her husband in New Jersey she came clad in a russet gown, and a white handkerchief pinned over her bosom, and the people who did not know her took her to be a servant girl.

Of course she was very glad when the war was over, and she could retire to the quiet of her own home, but there she was always busy. All the cloth then worn was homespun, and Lady Washington kept sixteen spinning wheels in constant motion. She and the general, her husband, had a large number of slaves to provide for, and consequently she used a great deal of domestic cloth, and she herself superintended everything that was done just like any farmer's wife.

The people ate plain food in those days, and Lady Washington's table was no exception to the general rule. It is said that the last course at dinner usually consisted of pancakes and molasses, or sugar if preferred.

As the wife of the president of the United States, she was not spoiled by honors and distinction. She was not haughty and supercilious, but was always gentle and agreeable, a good wife, a tender mother, and a valued friend.

When but nineteen years of age, Martha Skelton was left a widow, and quite wealthy, as was the Martha of whom we hav written above. She was a very beautiful woman, with large, dark eyes, and a lovely complexion.

She was quite well educated for the time in which she lived.

She had many lovers, and among them was one named Thomas Jefferson. He played the violin, and Martha played the harpsichord, which was then the fashionable musical instrument, instead of the piano.

In due time the twain were married, and after the ceremony and congratulations were over they started for their new home—Monticello. A snow-storm was in progress, or had fallen previously to quite a depth, and as they went on, it was in places so deep they were obliged to leave their carriage and proceed on their journey on horseback. When the sun went down they were still eight miles from Monticello, and the road was rough, snowy, and mountainous, and, of course, it was very late when they reached their home, and then they found the house all dark and closed up, for the servants, which were colored slaves, not expecting them, had all gone to their little cabins for the night.

It was not a very cheerful home-coming, you may be sure, with no fire, and shivering with cold, and nothing in the house to eat. But they laughed and made the best of the situation.

Mr. Jefferson had a large estate, and shortly after his marriage to Mrs. Skelton, her father died and left to her forty thousand acres of land and a hundred and thirty-five slaves. These slaves, and those belonging to her husband, all came under her immediate supervision, so that her cares and anxieties were unceasing. She was a noble woman, as good and kind as she was lovely and attractiv, and all her large household was much attached to her.

During the war of the Revolution, she was forced to fly from the enemy on two occasions. At one time, when Mr. Jefferson was governor of Virginia, the British, under Lord Cornwallis, determined to capture him in his own home at Monticello, and, in furtherance of that object, made a raid upon the place.

They destroyed all the growing crops, carried off the cattle, and burnt the barns. In addition to this they carried away thirty or more slaves, who afterwards died with small-pox, nearly all of them. But they did not get the governor, nor any of his family.

All these sad trials wore deeply upon Mrs. Jefferson, and her health began rapidly to fail, She was the mother of seven children, but only two lived to grow up.

Many times she hoped, many times she sorrowed, and, at length, long before overtaken by old age, she sickened and died.

Her death was a terrible blow to Thomas Jefferson, from which he never fully recovered, although he lived forty-four years afterward, and lived to be president of the United States. He was one of the greatest and noblest men that ever lived in this country, modest, unostentatious, yet brave, outspoken, and generous. He disliked all titles, and would not be addressed as "His Excellency," "Honorable," etc., and even deprecated the title of Mr. The brightest jewel of his life was his love for his wife, and the greatest praise that can be given her is that she deserved and was worthy of the love of such a man as Jefferson.

Thus these two Marthas were each connected by closest ties with two of the grandest and most notable men of our country, yet were gentle, true, and womanly, noble, lovable, honorable women, of whom we may well be proud, and whose memory is as fresh and sweet to-day as the fragrant rosebud just unfolded in its queenly beauty.

IL FAUT ATTENDRE LE BOITEAUX.

All your readers love me, especially when I'm fat;
Still, I hav but one leg—only think of that.
I run to many parties—I might run to you;
You would never leave me, till death came too.
Almost in my middle an article I wear,
A very useful article, I freely declare.
My other extremity, reckoning from my leg,
Is sometimes called "holy"—the spelling I beg.
By changing the spelling, still spelling wrong,
A body of water, deep, wide, and long.

My first, as reckoned by the sound,
A useful legume may be found;
My second, reader, is yourself,
Though poor, or blessed with boundless pelf.
My third, if used to measure years,
As half a century appears.
My fourth repeats my primal o'er,
With sound and meaning as before.
My fifth is just myself, I think.
My last, a beverage fit to drink.

I've paid a puzzler's compliment
To men of every continent;
A woman now my care shall claim,
Well to be won by "change of name."
If I could only "take her eye"
'Twould giv my looking-glass the lie;
And could I "steal her heart" away,
She should be won that very way.
Like Robin Gray, I'd steal her cow,
But she has none, I do avow.
Alas, alas, I giv it up!
But hold, she has a little pup—
I'll take the last of her ca-nine.
She's won! We're one! She's mine, she's mine.

TRANSPOSITION.

Come, you solvers, show your wit,
And solve this puzzle here.
I know you all are able to;
Of that I hav no fear.
My little word, two syllables,
Take Webster's and you will.
I dare not tell you any more,
But this it does mean—skill.
Reversed my word, a noted isle
In one of the Eastern seas,
From whence came a hero brave,
And disturbed Europe's peace.

A LETTER FROM A TEACHER.

BEAR LAKE, MICH., Nov. 24, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON:

. . . . Every two weeks we hav rhetoricals at school. My children are marched into the grammar-room, at the commencement of the afternoon session, and the time is divided between the two departments. Singing, reading, declamations, and dialogs fill the hours with a pleasing and varied program. The parents are very much interested, and always come in, and that encourages the children. I don't think I was ever in a community where so much attention was given to public speaking and singing. There is none of that diffidence in facing an audience which you often find among boys and girls. If you request a girl to recite a selection it is done as well as if it was a lesson in arithmetic or geography.

You ask me if I enjoy teaching here as well as I did in the East. On some accounts I prefer the West. As my school is not graded, it is more difficult to keep all the children busy, but it makes a teacher keen and quick-witted to hav a district school under her care. The parents are very sensible, and while they wish their children to progress as rapidly as possible, we hav no terrible examinations at the end of the term to look forward to, and from my conversations with the parents I know that no one desires any cramming or pushing. When a child is ready for promotion he is put into a higher class. I hav introduced some of my kindergarten work, and the children are fascinated with it. The boys are just as enthusiastic over the sewing-cards as the girls. The boys hav some trouble in threading their needles, and it is cunning sometimes to see a large boy go to a little fairy of a girl to get her to thread his needle. I did not expect they would care for it, but it will be of some service to them in sewing on buttons in the future should any of them be doomed to single life.

One of the best things that can be said concerning the people here is that they dress comfortably. You can wear a hood to church if you want to without losing caste. Arctic overshoes, good warm leggins, and mittens so thick that the wind cannot penetrate them form the regular costume of the people. No one minds the weather. Rehearsals, sings, and society meetings are always well attended in spite of rain or snow. To-night I attended a missionary concert. The children recited their recitations in leggins, and formed a great contrast to many tastily-dressed children you and I hav seen. It seems to me that this life must be an education in itself.

I am very glad that you are to publish your story. I know I shall enjoy it. I will send for a copy soon, and after I read it will do all I can to help its circulation. They hav a town library here, and hav a copy of your "Apples of Gold." Did you write a play for one of the societies in Fall River? Was it published, and can I get a copy from you? We shall hav some amateur theatricals here, and want some good plays. I see from the Detroit News that a woman suffrage association has been formed in Fall River. Did you join? The Good Templars are quite an activ society. They will hav a basket and night-cap sociable Wednesday evening. The young people are making fancy caps, which are really beautiful.

Did you see that Miss Blanche Willis Howard has dramatized her last novel, "Gwenn?" I should think it would take well, it is so full of thrilling scenes. I take the Boston Transcript to keep up with many Eastern events. I was glad to see that it was the intention of the state board of lunacy and charity to establish an institution for the care of inebriates. We hav a bird here who sings every evening. I never saw such a restless birdie. He cannot get to sleep until the house is still. He is said to inherit this trait from his grandmother. Excuse blunders. I hav written this while others hav been reading. Love to your mother and yourself. I remain,

Your friend, MARIA E. HARRIS.

Poetry.

Old Adam.

Old Adam was the first man,
As everybody knows;
He never paid no tailors bills,
Because he wore no clothes.
No white kid gloves upon his hands,
As you may well suppose;
No standing collar round his neck,
No shoes to hide his toes.

His wife his dinner cooked each day,
A good fat roast, or boiled,
But oftentimes for want of fire
His dinner, it got spoiled.
He would hav had it cooked with gas,
But that he couldn't afford,
From Youngstown would hav had his coals,
But the pits were not then bored.

His time passed happily away,
He led a frugal life,
And never quarreled with any one
Unless it was his wife.
He neither rent nor taxes paid,
No duns came to his door;
He had enongh of meat and drink,
And some left for the poor.

But the poor hadn't been born then,
Neither were the great;
No thieves or robbers called on him—
He never locked his gate.
Old Adam no example took
From other people's ways;
He never went to balls or routs,
To concerts, nor to plays;

For concert rooms and theaters
Old Adam had not seen;
And Eve was never once accused
Of kissing other men.
He lived on to a good old age,
Was never puffed with pride;
And when his days had run their course,
Alas! poor Adam died.

A MILD LUNATIC.

New Books.

ALL IN A LIFETIME: A Romance. By Susan H. Wixon. 12mo, 400 pp. Price, $1.50. For sale at the TRUTH SEEKER office.

This is, we believe, the result of Miss Wixon's first essay as a novelist. Her reputation as a writer of short stories was established with the first issue of "Apples of Gold," and has been perpetuated by her little sketches in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER. "All in a Lifetime" is a story that will wear well, because, like the works of Bulwer Lytton, it mingles philosophy with romance. Fiction serves its highest purpose when it conveys a useful lesson through the medium of the emotions. Failing in this, it is merely fictitious history of imaginary persons and events. A great many novels are even worse; while teaching little that is worth knowing, they inculcate the grossest superstition. "The Swiss Family Robinson," for example, which has had a wide circulation, is one of this latter sort; "All in a Lifetime," we are glad to observe, is not. This book tells, in an engaging manner, a most interesting story, with a lovely girl for a heroin. The plot is deep and well worked out. The characters, who are numerous, are distinct creations that do great credit to the genius of the author. It would be unfair to the writer of the story, as well as to the thousands who will read it, if we were to giv even an outline of the plot. The uncertainty as to how a story is to end, and the complications through which that end is brought about, constitute one of the principal charms of romance. Therefore with our best words as to its merits, and our best wishes as to its success, we recommend Miss Wixon's "All in a Lifetime" to the story-reading public. May it be profitable to the writer, as it is sure to be to the reader. The quality of this work, we may say, is not strained; it droppeth like the gentle dew from heaven upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed; it blesseth him that givs and him that takes.

THREE VISITS TO AMERICA. By Emily Faithfull. 12mo, pp. xii, 400. Cloth, price, $1.50. Published by Fowler & Wells Co. Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

We copy the publishers' announcement:

"The author of this volume needs no introduction to an American public; her work in behalf of struggling women during the past twenty years has been attended with so much success that she has acquired widespread celebrity in spite of herself. Her three visits in this country were made for the purpose of studying our society, our industrial methods and organizations, in behalf of poor and unfortunate English women, and the record of these three visits is not a rush into print to gratify personal motivs merely, or to let the world know 'my impressions of America,' after the style of so many foreign tourists, but the notes of a warm-hearted, practical observer who is in earnest for the improvement of the condition of her fellow-women, and givs her best experience in the tracings of her pen. Few writers on America hav seen so much of our country, talked with so many of our best people, and looked so deeply into our social habits and institutions; and as she relates the notable incidents of her journeys in a lively, agreeable manner, showing everywhere the woman of exuberant good nature, the reader is captivated at the start. One finds himself newly interested in things that he deemed familiar; reads about men and women of whom he has frequently heard, but set in new lights and phases. Sketches of conversation occur all through the book, most of them with well-known people, all of whom cordially aided. Miss Faithfull toward the attainment of her mission. It is pleasant to read her lively comments on such persons as Charles Sumner, Julia Ward Howe, Professors Colt Tyler and Maria Mitchell, George W. Childs, Charlotte Cushman, John Taylor the Mormon president, Thurlow Weed, and the hundred others she met. But what will most interest the American reader are the chatty comparisons made of our social mannerisms with those of old England, and the tendencies that she thinks are clearly to be seen in popular sentiment as concerns trade, government, labor, the woman question, art, and so on. The eminent utility of what Miss Faithfull says here and there makes the book valuable, and therefore desirable. While it will entertain everyone who takes it up, it will be sure to instruct those who are thoughtful."

THE EVOLUTION OF A LIFE, Described in the Memoirs of Major Seth Eyland.

In this volume, as we are informed, "Major Eyland, who commanded the First New York Mounted Rifles, describes his personal experiences in field and camp during the Civil War, as captain, provost-marshal, and judge-advocate, and givs scores of interesting and amusing anecdotes (never before published) of Lincoln, Grant, McClellan, Scott, Butler, Joe Johnston, Stonewall Jackson, Martin Van Buren, Horatio Seymour, President Arthur, Col. Fisk, and other noted men. Major Eyland's life in Europe as an art student and traveler also brought him in contact with many distinguished artists and scientists, and he relates in entertaining fashion curious and laughable episodes of travel and adventure, with personal reminiscences and bits of criticism." S. W. Green's Sons, of New York, are the publishers of this book. It is well written, well printed, and well bound. 12mo. $1.50.

THE AMERICAN LESSON OF THE FREE TRADE STRUGGLE IN ENGLAND. By Gen. M. M. Trumbull. 12mo; 290 pages. Published by Schumm & Simpson, Chicago. Price, 75 cents.

The cause of the protectiv tariff in this country is well and ably presented; that of free trade has not as yet called to its support an overwhelming number of adherents, but in the person of Gen. M. M. Trumbull it has at least one stanch defender. This book comes indorsed as "useful and instructiv" by John Bright, the eminent and popular free trade advocate of England, and contains arguments that are well worth considering, whether one reaches the same conclusions as the writer or not. We hav writers enough on the other side of this question; Gen. Trumbull is heartily welcomed as an expounder of free trade principles.

The list of contributors to the "Agnostic Annual for 1885" (Charles A. Watts, editor; H. Cattell & Co.) is exclusivly English, but comprises the best of the heterodox thinkers of that island. The editor opens with a short paper on "Agnosticism and Atheism," in which he states what to him appears the difference between the two isms: "Briefly put, Atheism concerns itself with the God-idea, one of many phases of the phenomena of being; while Agnosticism pertains to the great problem of existence in its grand totality. Its conflict with Theism is purely accidental, wholly subsidiary. It assails Christianity and all revealed religion, because their pretensions are opposed to the cardinal truth, that 'we know nothing of what may be beyond phenomena;' but disbelief in orthodox assumptions in no sense constitutes Agnosticism. Atheism, on the contrary, is simply and solely a negation of Theism; and with the popular rejection of a personal God and of revealed religion the raison d'etre of Atheism would be clearly non-existent." Mr. Charles Watts, father of the editor, and first vice-president of the National Liberal League, has a six-page article on "Agnosticism and Theology," in which the contentions of both are sharply defined. He treats of the origin of the universe, its nature, the existence of God, and immortality, from an Agnostic standpoint. His paper is to our thinking the ablest of the collection. "Mars Hill in London," by Moncure D. Conway, is a slight interposition in the philosophic encounter between the Messrs. Harrison, Spencer, and Stephen. Mr. Conway sees that Agnosticism is, after all, only a milder form of expressing Atheism. "The scientific sisterhood are tender-hearted; they hate to banish Theologia suddenly from their company, and compassionately delude their dying sister. Oh, of course, we cannot say but what you may turn out right; nobody can prove there isn't a god somewhere, and a heaven of bliss;' adding, sotto voce, 'and nobody can prove there isn't a skyblue peacock with a hundred heads and a million eyes on the other side of the moon?'" The value of Agnosticism, Mr. Conway thinks, is temporary; it is a notice given to Theology, final albeit tender, to quit the region of actualities. "Exit Theology, and one more is added to the Seven Sleepers. Enter Religion, and a leader appears among the Seven Champions." This religion which is to lead is not Christianity more than it may be Buddhism. It must be a religion which will abide in the known world, and invest with its consecration the actual life and daily duties of man. "It must now restore the union of believe and belove. There is faith, which accepts a basis on trust without knowledge; and hope, which raises personal desire into proximate harmony with universal law; but by these man knows only in part, as Paul says, or sees as in a mirror, obscurely; when that which is perfect is come, that which is in part is done away. This 'perfect' Jesus and John and Paul called love. And who can giv us a better name for the soul of religion? The greatest of all is love, for that alone is beyond dispute, free from doubt, casts out fear, is the supreme joy of life." Though this is a very shadowy kind of religion, it marks the present abiding-place of a number of able heretical preachers who will sooner or later join the Secular party.

The other contributors to the "Annual" are those best known to the English public as contributors to the Secular Review. One noticeable poem is a translation from Victor Hugo, by Thomas Mead, called, "The Council of Ten." Hugo loses nothing of his fire and force from being run through the translation mill, as too often happens, for Mr. Mead in poetry of his own has shown almost equal ability with the man whose glowing lines he places before English reading people. Another writer for the "Annual" is Dr. Edward B. Aveling, who has utilized this publication to excoriate his fellow-scientists who, seeing the light of science, are yet blind to the necessity of making their positions clearly known. Dr. Aveling calls them "the Messrs. Facing-Both-Ways of Science." With his feeling of impatience at their temporizing attitude we heartily sympathize.

There are many other articles in the "Annual" equally worth extended notice, but the limits of space are fast being reached. We hope that this "Annual" will be a permament publication, for while Agnosticism is being attacked on all hands, such expositions of its true meaning as are here given are urgently needed. The editor announces his intention to found a monthly journal of Liberal thought to be called The Agnostic, and this will also be devoted to the exposition and defense of the new philosophy. Altogether, Mr. Charles A. Watts deserves great commendation for so ably performing a duty which but for him—between those scientists who seem afraid of running counter to "respectability," and the Radicals who see in Agnosticism something in advance of pre-conceived ideas—would be left undone. For the price (25 cents) it would be difficult, too, to obtain better reading. We shall hav a supply in a week or ten days.

"Scott-Browne's Text Book of Phonography, Part II.," which has been announced as forthcoming for a considerable length of time, has appeared. To begin with, it is a handsome publication, and must hav involved an immense amount of work in its mechanical make-up, besides the research and experiment necessary in deciding finally what are the best forms for phonographic writing. The system of shorthand taught by Mr. Scott-Browne is called the American Standard. Unlike most other systems, it has shown itself to be progressiv. The author did not stereotype his first conceptions and put them before the world as the last word on the subject. Where he has seen opportunities for improvements, those improvements hav been unhesitatingly made. These are not, however, in the direction of arbitrary signs and intricate phrases, but in the way of consistency and legibility, and involve a theory of analogy which, proceeding from an established principle, carries a word through all its forms, both as to affixes and suffixes, without changing the form of the primitiv. The gain by this method in legibility must be apparent to all stenographers, and there is no apparent reason for fearing any sacrifice of speed. The system of syllabication observed in the American Standard would appear to be a great help also to legibility. For instance, when only mprtnr is given for "importuner," it is more legible thus, m-pr-tn-r, as written by Scott-Browne, than mp-rt-nr, as by another shorthand teacher. The author of this text-book believes that the systematizing work which he has performed on phonographic forms, together with the discovery that analogy may be generally applied to them, marks an era almost as important in the history of shorthand writing as did the invention of the art itself.

Phonography is certainly a study concerning which there is a growing interest. Perhaps it is not going too far to predict that sooner or later it will in a measure take the place of the present clumsy longhand, which is altogether too slow for the age. Some lucky man will undoubtedly discover a system adapted to every-day use. When that discovery is made there will be a revolution in chirography that cannot be other than beneficial. There is a system of phonetic writing connected with and growing out of Mr. Andrews's universal science, which exists in the Nature of Things. Little of it is known, however. Maybe Alwato is to bring the coming emancipation to both writers and printers from the slavery to a system of longhand writing which few comparativly hav been able to write with speed either gracefully or legibly.

The price of Scott-Browne's "Text-Book of Phonography, Part II.," is $2.00.

The Young Secularist and Family Freethought Paper is the title of a new monthly magazine for children published in Melbourne, Australia. It owes its existence to the untiring efforts for Freethought of Joseph Symes, who settled in Australia some months ago. It is an unpretentious little monthly, selling at 3d., but, teaching the laws of evolution, will no doubt soon exemplify them by blossoming forth in as fine garments as any juvenile paper—for somehow we think books for children should be made the most attractiv of all works. Older folks care for the matter; with children the manner is at least of equal importance. The contents of the first number are a biographical sketch of Thomas Paine; What is Secularism? the story of An Outcast, by Winwood Reade, Thomas Burt, by Joseph Symes; instructions how to be strong and healthy, Gems of Freethought, with riddles, poetry, and anecdotes. One of the stories is "Lazy Dick," the first story that Miss Wixon wrote for THE TRUTH SEEKER'S Children's Corner. So much of it as appears is without credit to author or paper—a bad example to set for young Secularists. The purpose of the magazine is about the highest to which printer's ink can contribute, and we sincerely hope the Liberals of Australia will giv it the generous support that its purpose merits.

Professor Augustin Knoflack, 35 Tribune Building, New York, is publishing a series of pamphlets entitled "German Simplified," designed for those who wish to learn the German language and hav not the advantage of a teacher. Three numbers hav been issued; twelve will complete the series. Price, per number, 10 cents.

No. 2, Vol. I., of The Mind Cure and Science of Life, A. J. Swarts, chief editor, has reached this office. It is a monthly, of Spiritualistic proclivities, devoted to the cause and cure of disease only. Published at 18 Tribune Building, Chicago, Ill. Terms, $1 per year; sample copies sent free by Mr. Swarts on receipt of four cents in stamps.

The Freidenker Publishing Company of Milwaukee, Wis., hav issued their sixth annual "Amerikanischer Turner-Kalendar" for the year 1885. It is printed in German, and contains a calendar and blank space in each month for memoranda, besides articles and poems on various subjects. Price 25 cents.

"The Decay of Institutions; or, An Argument Proving that Progress is a Fundamental and Universal Law—that Paradise is Ahead, not in the Past," is the title of a 42-page pamphlet by Moses Hull, at Maquoketa, Iowa. This has the right sound. The price is not given, but may be learned of Mr. Hull at the above address.

J. M. Wheeler, London, Eng., has printed a leaflet entitled "Gospel Lies." As it contains but eight 12mo pages, it is probably not exhaustiv. Price 5 cents. "Letters from Hell" is the name of a second publication by the same author, 28 Stonecutter st., London, E. C. 5 cents.

J. M. Peebles, M.D., has undertaken to tell, through a pamphlet of 99 pages, published by M. L. Holbrook & Co., "How to Liv a Century and Grow Old Gracefully." His major premis is that human life is a gift of God, but that we hav a duty to perform in prolonging it. Price 50 cents.

In this Weekly, which is now in the 13th year of its existence, political, social, and religious matters are discussed with a view to general enlightenment and progress. The "Turnzeitung," issued as a supplement to the "Freidenker," is especially devoted to the discussion of topics pertaining to physical culture, and matters of interest to lovers of the gymnastical art.

From January 1, 1885, the "Freidenker" will be enlarged, thus furnishing CONSIDERABLY MORE READING MATTER, while the PRICE WILL REMAIN THE SAME AS BEFORE.

For the convenience of those of our readers who are chiefly interested in matters relating to gymnastics, the "Freidenker" and "Turnzeitung" will be consolidated into one paper, to be called "Amerikanische Turnzeitung," with the sub-heading "Turnerische Ausgabe des 'Freidenker.'"

This paper will contain more reading matter than furnished by both the "Freidenker" and the "Turnzeitung" heretofore. In making these changes, the publishers have incurred great expense, and we therefore solicit the hearty co-operation of all friends of the cause in securing for the "Freidenker" and the "Amerikanische Turnzeitung" a wider circulation.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

The political aim of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which are as follows:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

In philosophy, THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates the upbuilding of a rational system that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. It is, therefore, both destructive and constructive.

Among the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most eminent men and brilliant writers in the Liberal ranks of the United States, including Courtlandt Palmer, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, T. C. Leland, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, W. S. Bush, Elliott Preston, John Peck, J. L. York, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Slenker, and many other able men and women. THE TRUTH SEEKER also makes a feature of reprinting the ablest English essayists and philosophers, and during 1884 has given its readers several papers from the pens of Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. The home contributors are legion, and the communications embrace the widest possible range of subjects—religious, philosophic, Anarchistic, Socialistic, land reform, tariff and political reform.

EVERY LIBERAL IN THE COUNTRY WANTS THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DEPARTMENTS:

In the League Department is recorded the news of the National Liberal League, furnished to our columns by the secretary, and other officers of the National and auxiliary Leagues.

We also have an able correspondent in Canada, who furnishes weekly news of the Freethought movement in that dominion.

Our Children's Department is edited by one of the best and most successful writers for children in the United States. Miss Susan H. Wixon is widely known, not only in the Freethought ranks, but as a writer for popular papers and magazines. We have from all sides the strongest testimonials to the efficiency of her work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She will continue the Department through 1885.

Through the department of "Letters from Friends" hundreds of subscribers have made pleasant acquaintances and lasting friendships. Its two pages are a place for exchange of thoughts, relation of experiences, and whatever the friends of Freethought find occasion to say. This department is a "talk together" of great and varied interest.

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER MAY BE GIVEN:

If any of our readers desire to read one of the best Freethought and reform journals published, we should unhesitatingly recommend to them THE TRUTH SEEKER, published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York, at $3 per annum. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a large, sixteen-page paper, and is filled each week with the choicest literature pertaining to Freethought and the overthrow of superstitions. It also ably discusses reforms politically and socially, and is really one of the best papers we have ever read. It is bold and fearless in its denunciations of kingcraft, priestcraft, and all other ways and means by which the people are held in bondage and ignorance, and no one can read THE TRUTH SEEKER a year without becoming nobler and better. You can get the paper three months on trial for fifty cents, and if you try it you will not want to be without it thereafter.—Rochester, N. H., Anti-Monopolist.

One of the finest monuments ever seen in this country has recently been erected to the memory of D. M. Bennett, founder of that able advocate of Freethought, THE TRUTH SEEKER, in Greenwood Cemetery, New York. One thousand friends of the dead journalist, admirers of his sterling qualities and the beauty of thought, goodness of heart, and the self-abnegation which distinguished his life, contributed to the fund by which this magnificent memorial was erected. A colored lithograph of this beautiful memorial has just reached us In reality it is a present that is appreciated more than cold words can express. Besides a view of the monument there is a fine likeness of Mr. Bennett. On the monument are engraved many of the famous utterances of the departed Liberal as well as the record of his life and the work to which many years of his activ manhood were devoted. THE TRUTH SEEKER perpetuates the fame of its founder by this truly generous act, and while accepting its generosity with thanks it is but just and proper that we should add our testimony to that of thousands of others who have many times declared that as an advocate o free thought, free speech, and all that is ennobling in nature THE TRUTH SEEKER has no superior in the universe.—Lackawanna Democrat.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is an iconoclastic journal. The sworn foe of superstition and error in all its forms, its motto might appropriately be, War, war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt—for it never lets a chance go by to hit superstition a resounding blow. It is a first-class exponent of what we call fighting Liberalism. . . . Under the direction of Mr. E. M. Macdonald, it still flourishes. Besides numerous articles of a polemic character, it contains a department for children, "Notes," "News," "Gems of Thought," "Odds and Ends," and numerous letters from correspondents. Besides THE TRUTH SEEKER, the firm publishes also Liberal books, one of the best specimens of which is their last publication, the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, a perfect gem, both in contents and finish, and which we would recommend to be sent for by those who are not yet acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER publications—The Sociologist.

TERMS FOR 1885:

Single subscription,	$3 00	One subscription with three new subscribers, in one remittance,	$8 50
One subscription two years, in advance,	5 00	One subscription with four new subscribers, in one remittance,	10 00
Two new subscribers,	5 00	Any number over five at the same rate, invariably with one remittance.
One subscription with one new subscriber, in one remittance,	5 00
One subscription with two new subscribers, in one remittance,	7 00

It is thus seen that any of our friends who will take the trouble to get a new subscriber at the regular rate ($3), will get his own for $2; by getting two new subscribers he will get his own paper for $1; by getting three new subscribers he will not only get his own free, but will have fifty cents left to pay cost of money order; by getting four new subscribers he will have his own free and gain $2.

This makes THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its sixteen large pages, cheaper than any other Liberal paper. If anyone chooses, or if by so doing he can easier secure partners in taking the paper, he can share with them the advantages of the club rates.

Odds and Ends.

A MAN who saw an apparition of his deceased wife said he was not scared, but sort of surprised, because he didn't ex-specter.

AREN'T you in a good deal of a hurry about getting your storm-doors up?" "Not an hour too soon. My wife's mother will arrive at noon."

PROFESSOR in moral philosophy: Mrs. R., what end has a mother in view when she punishes her child? Mrs. R. blushed and sat down.

WHY is it that the man who whangs an old copper cent into the contribution box generally leans back with a twenty-dollar look of benevolence?

THERE are in New York three survivors of the gallant six hundred who charged at Balaklava. The Balaklava charge was nothing compared with some of the charges made during the last presidential campaign.

"WHAT is the matter?" asked Briggs, the plumber, of his partner. "I've made the greatest mistake of my life. Did you know Simpson has just fallen heir to a large fortune?" "Yes; didn't you?" "No; and I hav sent him a bill for only $5,000 for last year's work."

Now that the campaign is over, the papers hav given up political lying, and hav settled down to promiscuous mendacity. A San Francisco paper remarks that a Chinaman has succeeded in teaching a bug to play Beethoven's immortal symphonies on a flute. As a starter that is a very good one.

IT is rather humiliating, says Peck's Sun, to be obliged to carry the legend, "Entered at the postoffice as second-class matter" at the head of a newspaper, but they all do it, so there's no advantage had one over another. By the way, who is the hairpin that decides American papers are all second-class?

HUSBAND (reading from Scott): Not one woman in twenty marries the first love. How was it in your case, my dear? Wife: How was it in your case? Husband: You must make the first confession—don't answer like a parrot by asking me the same question. Wife: Well, here's the honest truth. If you married your first love, I married my first; if you didn't, I didn't.

A HAPPY old Democrat in a town near Boston, flushed with his party's victory, sought out his old church last Sunday, and was greeted with surprise by acquaintances who had missed him from the services for years. "Why, how does this happen?" asked one. "Well," answered the Democrat, "the Lord has got around onto the right side again, and I thought best to giv him my encouragement."

MRS. JACKSON: Yes, since dem mis'ble Chinezers hez come in, we poo' whites hez to scratch fur a livin'. An' do yo' know, Missus Mufy, my boy ez goes to school was tellin' me all the people in Chanee walked with th' heads down an' er feet up? Mrs. Murphy: Laws, yer down say. Oi knowed th' Choinees menz war bad uns, but shure Oi thought th' ladies was mohr genteel 'n ter do that.

"WELL," he said to the minister at the conclusion of the marriage ceremony, "how much do I owe you?" "Oh, I'll leave that to you," was the reply. "You can better estimate the value of the services rendered." "Suppose we postpone settlement then, say for a year. By that time I would know whether I ought to giv you a hundred dollars or nothing." "No, no," said the clergyman, who is a married man himself, "make it three dollars now."

THE salary of the Baptist paster at Grantville, Neb., is $100 a year. The recipient does not try to liv on it, but works at his old trade of shoemaking. His congregation do not object to this way of providing cheap ministry to them, but they hav made a tremendous row because on several Sundays in making announcements from the pulpit, he includes a notice that he would mend shoes better and cheaper than the opposition cobbler. Now, we think that is real mean, remarks the Omaha Herald. The man saw that he could be useful in both channels and his congregation should not interfere.

LOVE WILL COME BACK.—RONDEAU.

Love will come back across the waste of years
  With smile—so mocking in the long ago—
A-weary of his wandering to and fro,
  Where tender feet left crimson prints in snow,
And tender eyes grew dim; a-thrill with fears
  If round his neck fond arms again may grow.
Love will come back.

The poet paused, then suddenly cried, "Blow
  The rhyming dictionary and the jeers
Of critics at my chestnuts; now I know
  Where I can work them off; hip, hip, three cheers,
Love will come back!"

PHONOGRAPHY & TYPEWRITING.

Many a bright young man or woman would like to come to New York to commence a business career. The best way is to learn these arts. They are new professions that are increasing in demand, and not yet full. I instruct young persons thoroughly, and get them positions. It takes five months to gain the requisit phonographic speed, 100 words a minute. Terms, $50 for the course, payable $10 monthly in advance.

Typewriting requires about two months practice, and can be learned along with phonography—only $10 extra. Send for circular. Address,

Notes and Clippings.

Two new colleges are being erected in Paris. They are to be called after the names of the Voltaire and D'Alembert.

It is stated that many Atlanta churches are paying more attention to music than ever before. It seems to be a bad year for religion all around.

The Rev. Heber Newton says that tadpoles and frogs were made as "jests of creation." If that is so, Talmage must be a five-act comedy of creation, says Puck.

The French Chamber of Deputies has rejected Bishop Freppel's amendment to restore the credits for scholarship in religious seminaries. Also, his amendment to restore the state pay of the superior clergy.

The qualification to vote in Rhode Island is as follows: Actual tax-paying citizens, who possess property to the value of $137, can vote after a residence of one year in the state and six months in the towns. Registration is required.

M. Cahill, M D., of New York, who has been recently deluging the aldermen with propositions to supply the city with water drawn from the clouds, sent in another letter to the board last week. He said: "It is demonstrated that the lightning flash and electric light are the same. Will you, then, suffer the almighty to be hired out by the year at from $5 to $8 per week?"

Here is a portion of an interview with a Queensland nativ, as reported in a Sydney newspaper: "Missionary very good fellow. Missionary he come along an' see Kanaka boy with banana leaf around him. Missionary he say, 'White man God no like banana leaf; white man God like calico.' 'Oh! and who sold the calico?' 'Oh, missionary, he sell calico.'"—Philadelphia Record.

Early exhibition visitors to New Orleans are astonished, on disembarking from a steamer, to find that the sewers are open streams of water at the sides of the streets, and running away from the river instead of toward it; to see wells built up from the ground, not dug into it; and to learn that the cemeteries are veritable "cities of the dead," the tombs being little houses with gables and roofs, and arranged in avenues and squares.

The scientists are always knocking out the poets, somehow. Professor Swindhurst has just discovered that the lark, so far from being the typical early bird, is the very latest to rise in the morning, and that the crow and the quail are real early birds detailed to start the kitchen fire and take in the early worm. These are on deck before anything except the owls, who do not deserve any credit, however, as they stay up all the night.

The daughter of Judge Kelley, of Washington, has gone and married a Russian Nihilist, to the excessiv grief of her doting father. If she had married a title, or even an average society young man, peace would hav dwelt in the parental bosom; but a Nihilist—one of those wretched creatures who risk life and liberty in their desperate efforts to wrest their country from the clutches of despotism—the poor girl is indeed to be pitied.—Puck.

This is strange news from the Episcopal Bishop Potter of New York. He has sent out a circular letter to all his clergy, in and near this city, asking them to hold conferences as to "what can be done against the gigantic evils of our society," of which he enumerates eighteen, one of them being the "wrongs inflicted by employers upon those whom circumstances hav placed at their mercy." Why, what does Bishop Potter mean? If his clergy should take hold of practical business of this kind, and do anything beside hawking and hemming over it, they would soon raise a storm about their heads that would bring down their pulpits. If they should preach even a few sentences of cold truth about it, they would not need to wait long for the pillars of the church to fall upon them and grind their salaries to powder. As long as they perform the ceremonies according to the books, and drone through the sermons according to tradition, it shall be well with them; but let them raise a finger of interference against the right of capital to do any wrong it pleases, and probably the bishop himself will fire the fagots to consume them.—John Swinton's Paper.

The vane for the tower of the new Board of Trade building in Chicago will represent a schooner in full sail, not cut out of a sheet of metal, but made in every respect like a model. It is nine feet long, eight feet high, and is built of sheet copper throughout. It weighs close to 200 pounds, and about 100 pounds of ballast will hav to be stored in its forward hold to balance it, as the support passes up into the forward mast. The schooner will always hav "her tacks aboard," for, of course, the bowsprit is the pointer.

A stereopticon exhibition was recently advertised to take place in the Methodist church in Norfolk. The stated preacher was indignant when he read the posters, and he caused a notice to be placed over each one to this effect: "This exhibition will not be given in the Methodist church," signing his name. One of the trustees, who had rented the building for the purpose, put another notice over that of the dominie's in these words, "This exhibition will take place as advertised," signing his name. It did take place, but the audience was small on account of the confusion produced by the various notices.

The Keene Observer tells this story: "In the virtuous little state of Vermont, in the town of Fairhaven, the pastor of the Congregational church visited the polls on election day and asked for a St. John ticket. His request was met with the remark by one of his parishioners (we believe a deacon of his church) that since his pastorate he had contributued yearly the sum of forty dolllars for the support of preaching, but that if he voted the prohibition ticket his subscription would cease. The pastor left the polls without voting, and it is presumed that the saintly church-goer who prevented him went home and prayed diligently for the southern blacks who were denied the rights of suffrage by the 'chivalrous' race of that section."

Felix Adler continued last Sunday his addresses on "Tenement House Reform" before the Society for Ethical Culture in Chickering Hall. He spoke of model tenement houses which hav been built in Hicks street, in Brooklyn, and in Water street, in this city. The cheapest apartment in the Brooklyn house rents for $6.50 a month and the dearest for about $11, and the house pays 6 per cent on the investment of its owner. The cheapest and dearest apartments in the Water street house rent for about $3.50 and $8 respectivly, and the investment returns 6 1–2 per cent. Women, he said, are the best agents for tenement house reform. He proposed that the owners of tenement houses should content themselvs with a return of 4 per cent on their investment, and that 2 per cent should be put away as a fund for old tenants who should become disabled. It was necessary, he said, that the legislature should limit the profits of landlords, in order that suitable tenements might be provided. As it is now, the worst houses pay the best. He proposed the extension and joining of Leonard and Pell streets in order that the squalid bend in Baxter and Mulberry streets may be broken up.

The report of the committee from the National Academy of Sciences upon the organization of the Signal Service, the Geological Survey, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Hydrographic office of the Navy Department has been made to the joint commission of Congress. The committee are of the opinion that all those organizations, and such other scientific bureaus as Congress may wish to include in the scheme, should be united in a Department of Science, whose head should be a man familiar with scientific affairs. Should the establishment of such a department be now impracticable, the committee suggest as the next best measnre the transfer of those bureaus to some existing department. They also recommend the creation of a commission to prescribe a general policy for each bureau, and suggest that it be composed of the president of the National Academy of Sciences, the secretary of the Smithsonian Institute, the superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the director of the Geological Survey, the officer in charge of the Meterological Service, an engineer officer of the army, a professor of mathematics in the navy skilled in astronomy, and two scientists not otherwise in the government service.

Some little trouble has been caused by the heterodox teaching of one of the professors of the University of Edinburgh. It has not for many years been deemed a necessity that non-theological chairs in the Scottish universities should be filled by men who were in any way bound to the national church. Among the occupants of these chairs are to be found members of the church of England, Nonconformists, and Presbyterian dissenters. It has always been understood, however, that whatever might be the private opinions of these men, they should conform their teaching to the religious requirements of the general situation, and do nothing fitted to hav the effect of upsetting the faith of the young men attending their classes. In the University of Edinburgh Dr. Cossart Ewart fills the chair of natural history. Dr. Ewart has been charged with violating this honorable understanding, and with using contemptuous language regarding design in creation. According to him the doctrin of evolution has deprived of all force the argument from nature in favor of the existence of a God. Among the young men who attend the natural history class are many who are looking forward to the Christian ministry, and such teaching, it is felt, is like poisoning the stream at its source. Protests hav been made from several of the Edinburgh pulpits, and Professor Ewart is likely to find himself in a hot seat.

Robert Collyer talked sense from his pulpit last Sunday. The first thing that he said when he began his sermon on "Children's Rights," was that he had the worst cold he had had in ten years. Then he said it was one of the chiefest rights of children that their health should be guarded by their parents, so that they should grow up strong and proof against colds. It was a cause for perpetual thanksgiving on his own part that his parents had bequeathed to him a vigorous body, which was able to throw off the effects of a cold when he imprudently caught one, and which gave him a good digestion and a contented mind. What the Declaration of Independence says about the rights of men was designed, Mr. Collyer went on to say, to apply equally to the rights of women and children. Under it children had rights that the home and the church were bound to respect. The first of these rights was the birthright claim to the wisest and very best training the parent could giv. The young who are approaching manhood and womanhood should see to it that their own lives are pure and righteous before they dare to assume those duties of manhood and womanhood which include the sacred duty of training the child. They must recognize the great value of a sound body as a primal element in insuring to their children that sound health which will form a sound basis upon which to train up a useful and activ existence. It is a right of the child to hav its natural tendency to run counter to the laws of diet corrected by the parent, and to hav the lesson enforced that it has no right to make an invalid of itself by such disregard of the rules of health. Another right that children hav is to enjoy proper rest and recreation, and still another and all-important right is to hav the parent answer, tenderly and conscientiously, and with the best knowledge, those questions which the young ask when their awakened minds begin to grapple with the questions of life and eternity. When the child reveals a deep and clearly defined predilection for any life work whatsoever it should be allowed to follow that preference. For the parent to restrain any such aspiration for usefulness, because it appears original and far away from the track the father has followed, is to commit a very foolish blunder.

News of the Week.

Boston went Democratic by 3,000 in its election of mayor.

There were twenty-one deaths from cholera in Paris last week.

The present membership of Beecher's church in Brooklyn is 2,569.

Chicago reports the business outlook to be hopeful in that locality.

A brick factory worth $30,000 was burnt at Petersburg, Va., last week.

The workingmen of New York talk of having an idle men's parade. Material will not be found wanting.

Two Jewish converts to Christianity were baptized publicly in this city last Sunday. Both were young men.

The strike among the hatters at South Norwalk, Conn., is not yet ended. The strikers talk of going into business for themselvs.

A revolution has occurred in Corea, a kingdom tributary to China. The king fled to the hills, and his son and six ministers were massacred.

While Mr. Dawson, of Newark, N. J., was at dinner one evening last week, thieves entered his house and carried away $6,000 worth of jewelry.

A Belgian horse-trader has just landed at New York four stallions the average weight of which is 1,800 pounds. The largest weighs 2,200 pounds.

Talmage is on a tour through the South, and excites considerable curiosity. He will do the opening prayer act at the World's Exposition in New Orleans.

All the incoming steamers report severe storms on the Atlantic from the 7th to the 13th inst, and heavy head winds. Many vessels are four or five days overdue.

Martin R. Melht, assistant postmaster at Grand Rapids, Mich., was arrested last week for soliciting contributions for campaign purposes, contrary to civil service rules.

Henry Walker was mate of a schooner, and, the captain dying, he sold the cargo. He was tried for piracy and sentenced to six years imprisonment in the Albany Penitentiary.

William Wannemacher, the young temperance orator who personated Jesus Christ in Salmi Morse's Passion Play, died recently at Norriston, Pa., of hemorrhage of the lungs. He was 28 years of age.

An attempt was made last week to blow up the bridge across the Thames river at London, Eng., known as the London Bridge. The explosion was terrific, but the bridge was uninjured. The police are unable to discover the criminals.

Capt. Howgate, the absconding Signal Service chief, has revealed his continued existence by writing Lieut. Greely for a loan of money. He does not giv his post-office address, requesting that the loan be sent to his daughter in Cleveland, Ohio.

A delegation of the Salvation Army from Toronto, Can., was recently sent to Montreal. The delegates, five in number, commenced the campaign against Satan by parading through the streets singing popular tunes. They were promptly taken in by the police.

Among the sermons preached from New York pulpits last Sunday were one on the "messianic superstition," one on the rights of children to a healthy generation instead of regeneration, and one on the tenement house system. If the pulpit goes on in this direction it may become useful.

The Saxon, the Irishman, and the Roman.

From C. L. James's History of the Dark Ages.

We come now to a country lying outside the Roman Empire, and which in modern times is known best as the Island of Sorrow, but which in the first part of the Dark Ages was not less important than Gaul or Spain, England, or even Italy. Previous to the fourth century, indeed, Ireland had almost no authentic history. The material collected from nativ tradition and from the allusions of foreign writers is either legendary or inconsequential; and to show how little is known of Irish antiquities, we need only mention the celebrated round towers. These unique structures can hardly be designed for fortifications, as they are not large enough to contain any considerable number of men; they cannot hav been used as observatories, for they are frequently in valleys, so that nothing could be seen from the top but hills, and also because there is no apparent way of ascending. By whom, or when, the round towers were built, is just as great a mystery as for what object. Every writer on Ireland has a theory of this subject, and the sum of the theories is that we know nothing about it. The island, however, was known to the Romans; and the Irish, who were then seafarers, merchants, pirates, and conquerors, occasionally encountered the legions in battle on the shores of Britain. Accounts of some of these wars may be found in the Encyclopedia Britannica. St. Patrick, according to general tradition, was a captiv from Britain,* and it is probable those Saxons whom Gregory the Great saw in the slave market of Rome were also brought over by Irishmen. Never did vessel bear a more unlucky freight!

> "Ill speed that fatal, that perfidious bark,
> Built i' th' eclipse and rigged with curses dark."

The conversion of England to Christianity was the beginning of a revolution which affected all Europe, and ruined Ireland.

Ireland is commonly said to hav been converted by St. Patrick during the fifth century. There are, however, reasons for doubting the tradition. It seems more probable that the Irish were converted by sundry British missionaries, very likely of the Pelagian sect,† and perhaps before the beginning of the fifth century. Two things, however, are certain: that only fifty years after the alleged date of St. Patrick, Ireland was the most activly Christian country in Europe; and that it was not then subject to the Roman see.‡

The whole of the sixth century was a time of great depression throughout Europe. From the death of Clovis (A.D. 510) Gaul presents nothing but a series of crimes and revolutions. Christianity, which was far from thoroughly established among the rural population, sensibly declined.§ Italy, though more prosperous than any part of the empire, was repeatedly scourged by the arms and controversies of the heretical Goths and Lombards, and the orthodox but rapacious Greeks. Extensiv districts were reduced to utter desolation; multitudes perished by famin; and the curse of universal beggary settled down upon the whole country as a necessary consequence of the abolition (by Odoacer) of the imperial system of poor relief. As to Spain, she seems, indeed, to hav increased in wealth, but her annals are almost empty. England presents the unique phenomenon of a country destitute of reliable history, not because there was nothing to record, but because an invasion of barbarians had entirely swept off her civilization.‖

During this dark period Ireland was truly the center of light to all countries. The number of her saints¶ is almost inexhaustible; and it must be confessed that there was something in their zeal, not merely for dogmas, but for civilization and humanity, which goes far to justify the admiration bestowed on them by posterity. The most famous was Columban, born about 545 A.D., who traveled all through the Frankish kingdoms, founded many abbeys, and died at the great monastery of Bobbio, Italy, one of his own organization. His disciple, St. Gall, established and gave his name to an equally famous institution in Switzerland. St. Columba, or Colum-cille, somewhat younger, may be said to hav converted Scotland beyond the Grampians. His disciples were among the chief evangelists of England, as those of Columban were the stoutest barriers against Frankish paganism in Gaul. Yet had they only spread one religion at the expense of another, I, at least, should not hav esteemed them worthy of high praise. Their glory is that in an age of universal ignorance they were persevering cultivators of knowledge, and that amidst increasing servility they were steady champions of freedom. From the sixth century to the English conquest in the twelfth, the Irish schools, chiefly at the monasteries of Armagh and Darrow, were the best in any Christian country. This period exactly measures the independence of the Irish church. Wherever the Irish missionaries penetrated we find them busily engaged in compiling and copying books, and re-inventing the instruments of literature, whose use had almost been forgotten in the barbarous West. For this purpose, e. g., St. Columba and his followers used waxen tablets, like those of the Romans. At the same time the Romish monks were chiefly employed in eliminating the thoughts of Plato or Homer from parchments which, thus purified of pagan trash, might be devoted to pious legends of how St. Anthony was tempted by the devil in the form of a beautiful woman, or how St. Denys walked about with his head in his hands after martyrdom St. Columban informed the Roman priests he met in Gaul that the reason he did not keep Easter at the same time with themselvs was that the Irish were better astronomers.

The Irish of a later period than the sixth century were long equally remarkable both for learning and for spirit. The Roman writers do not distinguish them carefully from the Scotch*, but the anecdotes preserved of them denote a very different national character. The greatest of them all, John Scotus Erigena, studied Greek, translated Diophantes the Areopagite, and three centuries before the scholastic philosophy arose, applied Plato to the solution of the problem of the will.

At a drinking bout with a Frankish prince who sat opposit to him, he was asked by the latter, "How far is Scot from sot?" "Just the width of the table," replied the philosopher. I think this was like an Irishman, and not like a Scotchman. Virgil, who is said to hav asserted the true form of the earth, was also an Irishman. His doctrins were condemned by Pope Zachary, who bestowed the crown of France on Pepin†. Clement, an Irish heresiarch, gave great trouble to the Gallic church in the somewhat earlier reign of Charles Martel. About a hundred years later, Hincmar, the famous archbishop of Rheims, solicited the aid of Scotus Erigena to refute the German monk, Gotteschalk, who, from the writings of St. Augustine, deduced the predestinarian doctrin, and had triumphed in debate over Rabanus Maurus, reputed the greatest French scholar then living. It was, indeed, a sign of the times that St. Augustine was read at all. Thanks to the Irish chiefly, the reign of absolute ignorance and unquestioning superstition was giving way to that of speculativ theology. Material prosperity had not yet reached the nadir; but literature and reason were arising from the bottom of the abyss, and began to cast on lances' points and castled rocks a faint and fitful luster, like the first rays of the Arctic sun, when he revisits the horizon. Scotus, in his reply, used arguments of a pantheistic character, which drew on this greatest scholar of the Dark Ages the anathema of Rome.

But it was in England that the great battle between papacy and schism, ignorance and intelligence, Rome and Ireland, was fought out. The first recorded mission to the Anglo-Saxons came from Rome in the year 597. Queen Burnhaut, of France, took a great interest in the holy missionaries whom Gregory the Great sent out.‡ Their way was also prepared by the marriage of Ethelbert, king of Kent, to a Christian princess, Bertha, daughter of King Charibert of Paris, who renewed the worship of Jesus at Canterbury, in a ruined and deserted church which her husband had given her for the purpose. This monarch, who seems to hav been remarkably good-natured, gave a courteous reception to the Roman abbot Augustin, or Austin, and at their first meeting had patience enough to hear a long Latin sermon translated word by word. After about a year, he consented to be baptized, as did also many of his people, including the subordinate kings of Essex and East Anglia. In 617, Edwin, prince of Northumberland,* who had been in exile at the court of Ethelbert, was made king by the death of his rival, Ethefrida. Taking advantage of Edroni's friendship for Ethelbert, Rome hastened to attempt his conversion. He married the daughter of the new Kentish king (Ethelbert having died in 616), and this Christian princess brought to his court Paulinus, a follower of Austin, whose meager Italian face, surrounded with black hair, made a strong impression on the "blue-eyed, snub-nosed Saxons." Edwin soon became a Christian, and on consulting his Witenagemot,† found them not averse to a general change, so that in a few years Christianity had superficially overspread the principal kingdoms of the Saxons. But their nativ gods were not to fall without a struggle. These savage people had two principal deities, Wodin, to whom they looked for help in war, and Thor (thunder), probably the only power of which they were afraid. Hope and Fear, embodied in these terrific idols, were not easily dethroned. After the death of Ethelbert, Essex relapsed into paganism. East Anglia adopted a mixture of Christian and pagan absurdities very common among barbarous converts. Penda, king of Mercia, took up the cause of the old gods in the name of Saxon independence, and, in order to gain an ally, promised Cadwallon of Wales to assist him in subduing certain settlements from Wessex upon the river Severn,‡ if he in turn would help Penda to break down Northumberland. At the battle of Hatfield, Edwin was defeated and slain (A.D. 633). Paulinus fled, the heretical Welsh overran Northumberland, and Penda, having thus got them off his hands, appropriated the disputed territory on the Severn to himself.

The war, however, continued; religion being the avowed issue. Oswald, the new king of Northumberland, a devout Catholic, defeated Cadwallon, who was slain in the battle, somewhere near the Roman wall across the island from Forth to Clyde. Meanwhile, Penda conquered East Anglia. Oswald was sagacious enough to see that priests could do more for him than soldiers, if they had courage enough to risk a martyr's death. He accordingly procured from the Irish-Scotch monastery of Iona, a missionary, St. Aidan, who founded the famous church of Lindisfarne, whence cohorts of preachers soon overspread Mercia itself. In 639, the Gallic missionary Birinus converted the king of Wessex. Penda had the advantage in the field; but the hearts of the people were slipping away from him. In 642, however, he triumphed over Oswald, who was slain in trying to conquer East Anglia. This victory, for a time, made a great change. The newly converted king of Wessex apostized, and married Penda's sister. All Northumberland was fearfully ravaged by Penda and his allies. He even besieged Bamborough, the impregnable castle of the Northumbrians—it was only a hedge or stockade, but stood on an inaccesible rock. Penda endeavored to burn this last retreat of his enemies, but rain and contrary wind, attributed to the prayers of a conveniently situated saint, frustrated his plan, and he retired disappointed. Wessex soon afterward returned to the Christian alliance; Penda's own son and viceroy, Wulfere, became a Christian; and in proportion as Christianity gained ground against paganism, so did Northumberland against Mercia. At last Oswy, king of Northumberland, defeated the now aged Penda in a decisiv battle near Leeds, where he perished with the bulk of his army. "The Galilesan had conquered." Wulfere, being a Christian, readily submitted to Northumberland§, which thus, after thirty years of fighting, became the dominant state. No sooner was the fate of paganism sealed, than Rome stretched forth her claws to seize what others had won. It was by the Irish of Iona that England had been converted, and the success of Oswy made possible. In the reign of this same monarch the Irish were expelled from England. The lives of the Iona missionaries, St. Aidan, St. Cathbert, who converted the worthy St. Chad, the chief apostle of the Midland country, shine with a mild and peculiar luster. We find in them little of the policy, severity, and subordination of Romanism, little of the frenzies of the Eastern monks. Good-natured, witty, dreamy, contemplativ, unwordly; now hearing the songs of angels; now jesting and arguing with half-savage peasants; now lost in the snow, but

* Some writers say Boulogne. The original accounts mentioned two places as near the scene of his birth.

†Pelagius (more properly Morgan) was a Welshman, and his doctrin, as anti-Roman, was popular in Britain.

‡The Celtic churches differed from the Roman about the mode of administering baptism, the time of keeping Easter, and the question of jurisdiction, the Welsh and Irish acknowledging only their own metropolitan, and not the head of the Roman church, whose authority previous to the dissolution of the empire had been a part of the imperial system which was highly unpopular in the far West.

§Cannibalism was openly practiced by the Franks during their invasion of Italy under Lothaire. The laws of the Merovingian kings provide a hundred lashes as the penalty for pagan worship. The influx of Germans which went on steadily till Charlemagne's time of course depressed Christianity.

‖The Saxons are said to hav landed in Kent in 449. A very imperfect British chronicle follows till about 520, when we reach the absolutely fabulous Arthur. The Saxons wrote nothing till they learned Latin, about 597, from Roman missionaries.

¶She was called the Isle of Saints. The practice of canonization by the pope, it must be remembered, was not instituted till much later. The saints of the sixth century were proclaimed such by their bishops.

*It is the prevailing theory that Ireland was the original Scotia from which western Scotland was settled, and that the Picts inhabited eastern Scotland. I see no proof.

†Catholic writers assert that the condemnation was on a theological point, wholly unconnected with geography. An ancient epigram says of this Virgil that "Ireland brought him forth, informed, taught, cherished, and loved him."

‡The story about Angli and Angeli is too old to be repeated here.

*I think that the "kingdom" may quite as properly be designated by its English name as by the Latin form, Northumbria. Of course it did not at all correspond to the modern county, but included an indefinit territory between the Humber and the Grampians. It is among the most misleading errors of those historians who are content to copy their predecessors to speak of the Saxon Heptarchy, the kingdoms of Kent, Austrasia, Neustria, etc. These names correspond to no definit geographical divisions, for political geography was an unknown science when the kingdoms, confederations, etc., are said to hav existed.

†The assembly of principal landlords (thanes) which performed the function of a parliament.

‡The actual number of the Saxon states was not seven, but is indefinit and unknown. Those most marked by opposing geographical policies were Kent (southeast), Mercia (central, and contiguous at once to the Thames, the Humber, and the Avon), Wessex (southwestern, and always pushing north and west into the territory of the nativ Britons), and Northumbria —i. e., North-Humber-Land—(the country beyond the great river whence it takes its name).

§He reasserted and recovered his independence in 685.

remarking placidly that the way to heaven is easily found—such is the character given them by the Chronicles. Toward the end of the struggle, Wilfrith of York, and Benedict Biscop, became known as activ Catholic clergymen, opposed to the schismatics who had saved the country. Both acted in constant communication with Rome. The latter established the great monastery at Wearmouth, and filled England with relics for the superstitious multitudes, and popish books for those who could read.*

At last, in 664, a council was held for the purpose of deciding the future allegiance of the English church, at the famous convent of Whitby, founded by St. Hilda, a woman of royal Saxon race. Colman, of Lindisfarne, appeared for Ireland, Wilfrith as the champion of Rome. "You admit," said the king to Colman, after hearing the discussion, "that Christ gave to Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Did he ever giv them to your master, Columba?" Colman acknowledged the contrary. "Then," said Oswy, "I would rather obey the porter of heaven, lest, when I reach the gates, he should turn his back on me, and there be none to let me in." The Irish churchmen generally left the country upon this decision. Cuthbert alone remained, till his death in 681. Four years after the council at Whitby, Theodore of Tarsus, a monk of Grecian origin, was brought over to reorganize the English church on Romish principles. He subordinated all the sees to that of Canterbury, the most papal in the country, and established the parochial system, which had not previously existed in the island, the bishop being hitherto only a sort of "resident embassador" at the court of a Christian king. During the ensuing century, the eighth, the benedictine role was established by the Carlovingian emperors throughout Gaul, thus giving Rome the monasteries of the continent, which, like those of England before, were founded by the Irish, and had probably preserved Christianity from the inroads of German paganism. England was henceforth one of the most popish of countries. From England proceeded those theologians, such as Alcuin, who enabled Charlemagne to make Gaul so. An Englishman, St. Boniface, assisted by the sword of Charles Martel, established Christianity and Romanism together throughout Germany. The effect of the council of Whitby was to sweep the Irish from all countries but their own, with a stroke of Peter's fabled keys. Thus did Rome deal with those Christians whose merit was at least no less than this, that they had saved English Christianity, in the hour of its mortal crisis, from the sword of Penda.

Six hundred years went by, during which Ireland remained neglected in the vast solitude of the Atlantic Ocean, then supposed the limit of the world. At last the combined ambition of Rome and Normandy effected the subjugation of the island itself. The history of this event is so curious and interesting, and has been the subject of so much misrepresentation, that some digression may be allowed for the purpose of setting it in the true light. Adrian IV. (Nicholas Brakespeare) the only English pope, assumed the tiara in 1154. In the same year (October 25th) died Stephen, the last and least successful of the Norman kings of England, to be succeeded immediately by the greatest and first of the Plantagenets, Henry II. Within one year the English pope had issued a bull authorizing the English king to take possession of Ireland. The grounds of his right to do so are curious. With the usual babyishness of a pope† he applies to St Peter the promis of "the isles," and gravely asserts that the successor of Peter has power to dispose of any island! It was, as Mr. Hallam remarks, an especially curious argument to address to a prince who took his highest title from the possession of an island; but Henry was conspicuous for the happy faculty of appreciating the comparativ value of words and things.

The Catholic writers of the time apparently thought it necessary to giv some better reason than Adrian's for the transaction, and found it in the alleged disorganized state of the Irish church. St. Bernard says that throughout Ireland generally there was a total dissolution of ecclesiastical disciplin; and savage barbarism had succeeded Christian customs. Of evidence to sustain this charge against the Irish, there is not an iota. They were then, as they always had been, on bad terms with Rome; they had also suffered greatly, like other nations, from the inroads of the piratical Scandinavians; but they had beaten off the latter,‡ and their disagreement with the former was nothing new. The actual invasion of Ireland by the pope's cohorts was, however, delayed until that well-known quarrel among the Irish themselvs, which facilitated it in 1166. In 1172 Henry, fearing that the mercenary troops who went over to help the party of McMurragh, would establish an independent government, undertook a royal progress through the island, and received the submission of the nativ chiefs. It is well known that the English conquest at this time was very imperfect, and that war continued off and on until the Protestant Reformation. After the battle of Bannockburn (A D. 1314), the Ulster Irish, then the most purely nativ branch, allied themselvs with Bruce, the hero-king of Scotland. The pope excommunicated Bruce and them. They achieved, however, a very considerable success. In 1367 the (Norman) parliament of Kilkenny decreed the excommunication of any baron who should form an alliance with the nativ race, or adopt their customs, as many of the invading people had by this time done. The statute, however, could not be enforced, and the result of this revolution was to reduce the English to some coast places and the small region termed the Pale. Since the Reformation the Catholic clergy hav naturally excited the passions of the Irish against the English, as they did formerly those of the English against the Irish.

[The concluding words were written about two years ago. They require modification now. No sooner has Ireland shown hopeful signs of independent national life, than the kaleidoscope has taken another turn, and, presto, change! the pope's tiara once more appears beside the English crown, and Rome institutes a new series of measures hostil to Ireland; first remonstrating against that dangerous spirit exhibited by the National party; then p sitivly prohibiting the clergy to assist the movement; and now beginning to require that they shall activly oppose it. Rome is sagacious; but she has sometimes made mistakes. She evidently much prefers Ireland divided, distracted, and enslaved, to Ireland free and united, without distinction of race or creed. Whether she can keep the former remains to be seen. It is the function of the historian to narrate, not to prophesy. I hav shown that Rome has always been Ireland's enemy, except when she could use Ireland for a cat's-paw. Why this is, and what comes of it, is submitted to the consideration of the once great Irish nation.]

NOTE.—That the Irish during the Dark Ages were at variance with Rome is as plain as anything in history. But since it has been denied by Catholic writers, I here giv a synopsis of the evidence on the other side, taken chiefly from Milner's "End of Controversy," a work which has received unbounded praise from Romish authorities generally, and which, being written for Irishmen, and published in reply to some unpleasant reminders of this sort, may be considered to put the Roman argument with its very best foot foremost. The significance of the original authorities will be found indispensable to the argument.

1. The British bishops were represented in the councils of Arles and Nice, which acknowledged the pope's authority, and at that of Sardica, A.D. 347, where the right of appeal to the pope in all ecclesiastical cases from every part of the world was confirmed (Can. III.). In the fifth century also, St. Germanus was sent by the pope into Britain as legate (vice sua) (Chron. St. Prosper), and appointed St. Dubritius archbishop of Wales (?) (Antiq. Eccl. Landao).

Answer.—All this is probable enough, except the last statement, for which the authority is questionable. But it proves nothing, for all this was before the fall of the Roman empire. The pope's metropolitan authority derived from the emperors has nothing to do with his alleged spiritual sovereignty as Peter's successor. Let us hav proof that the British bishops acknowledged that.

2. St. Austin, the pope's legate and first bishop of Canterbury, was willing to unite with the British bishops in converting the English to Christianity, providing they would keep Easter at the Romish time, and adopt the Romish ritual. It follows they must hav acknowledged the pope's universal authority.

Answer.—Where is the proof that Austin himself acknowledged it, or that, understood in the modern ultramontane sense, it was as much as heard of in England before the Council of Whitby?

3. Two years after this conference, the bishop of Landaff, Audoceus, went to Canterbury to receive consecration from St. Austin (Bede Eccl. Hist. L. II, c. 2). Ever after this the bishops of Landaff acknowledged the see of Canterbury for metropolitan, without disapprobation from the Welsh (Antiq. Eccl. Landao).

Answer.—We know so little about the conditions of consecration in the Welsh church during the Dark Ages that the facts (so far as they are positiv, which is a very important reservation) prove nothing.

4. The Welsh bishops were in communion with the Irish, therefore the Irish must hav been in communion with Rome, and therefore hav acknowledged the pope's supremacy as successor of Peter and vicar of Christ.

Answer.—The first term in the syllogism having fallen to the ground, the rest falls with it. We hav shown that the Irish made no such submission to Rome, and that there is no satisfactory evidence that even any part of the Welsh ever did, while it is admitted by Milner himself, and all others, that they, like the Irish, commonly and openly disobeyed the pope in sundry manifest particulars. But if it is not proved that the Welsh were in communion with Rome, nothing follows from the fact that they were in communion with the Irish.

5. But there are also direct arguments to prove that the Irish between the days of St. Patrick and those of Adrian IV. acknowledged the authority of the pope. A number of such instances are cited by Milner.

Answer.—Unfortunately every one of them rests on the testimony of the uncritical Usher, that is, on mere tradition, and not on contemporary evidence. The truth in this, as in a hundred similar cases is, that the pope's authority before the dissolution of the empire cannot in the least be identified with that asserted by Gregory VII. and other pontiffs about the end of the Dark Ages. The former was a part of the constitution of Constantine, and professed no higher origin; the other is alleged to rest on the alleged authority of Peter three centuries before Constantine. The former was the place of a chief among equals, the latter is that of an absolute sovereign. The former is bound up with the ancient arrangements of the empire; the latter began by assuming that the empire had long ceased to exist. The former is separated from the latter by a clean-cut interval of full six centuries, and every glimmer of evidence that can be found in the intervening chaos confirms the thesis that during the interval the pope's authority over the western church was not acknowledged either as it had been before, or as it came to be afterward, but that the way for its future establishment was being prepared by encroachments like that which was consummated at Whitby, where barbarians were made Romanist by arguments only fit for babies.

*He is said to hav introduced the first glass window into England.

†Nothing can be a more curious psychological study than the papal bulls. The driveling weakness of the arguments, the puerility of the rhetoric, the sagacity and the sternness of the policy, render those famous documents unique reading, indeed.

‡The decisiv battle of Clontarf was fought in 1014. Occasional inroads occurred afterward, but, considering the position of Britain, I think they must hav virtually ceased by 1155.

Brother Walker's Dilemma.

The blunt and practical question I put to our mutual friend, Mr. E. C. Walker, has placed him in a position where he can neither advance, retreat, nor stand still, and so, as in his last article, he tries to dodge. If he says squarely that there is no limit to the number of murderous assaults through rum, which a community must suffer before a Freethinker would hav a moral right to vote "no" concerning the further sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, he at once writes himself down as a monster of bad reasoning.

On the other hand, if he declares explicitly that there is a limit somewhere, he thereby givs to the winds the "complete" liberty theory he so dilates upon, and becomes the enemy of his own teachings. If he stands still, I shall, of course, keep "prodding" him, for although his sad predicament appeals strongly to my sympathy, I feel that having asked a plain, straightforward question, all justice demands that I insist "till death do us part" upon having an equally plain and straightforward answer from him. When this, my just due, is granted, I shall be only too happy to reply to his last article.

The question I asked him was this: "If the drunken stabbing of three innocent people upon the public street, as recently happened in this city, does not giv a just cause for legal protection against the rum-beverage traffic, what would?"

Would twice three, or twenty times three, or one hundred times three, justify a Freethinker in appealing to law against the hell-broth that was the direct cause of these dastardly outrages? If Brother Walker thinks that thousands even of such murderous assaults upon innocent people would not be sufficient, will he please say so plainly, in order that THE TRUTH SEEKER readers may be enabled to judge which of us is making the best use of his reason?

If he has a limit at all, however wide it may be from mine, then I can truthfully welcome him into the ranks of the opponents of "personal liberty," and will do my best to make him as tyrannical as the personal safety of the public demands.

Dare Brother Walker assert that no amount, however large, of rum-murders would justify the "no" vote I always throw on the question of allowing saloons in this city? GEORGE N. HILL.

Knocking Evolution Out.

TALMAGE STANDS UP TO IT FOR FOUR ROUNDS, MARQUIS OF QUEENSBERRY RULES.

From the New York Sun.

The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, in the Baptist minister's weekly meeting of Murray street, yesterday, answered the question, "Is there such a thing as evolution?" in a lecture an hour long. The lecturer and the ministers' applause made so much noise that business men in that neighborhood came to the doors and windows to listen and enjoy.

ROUND 1.—All the best instruments used by scientific men, Mr. Talmage said, belong to Christian institutions. Morse, inventor of the telegraph, was a Christian; Cyrus W. Field, who swung a cable under the Atlantic, was a Christian; James Y. Simpson of Edinburgh, discoverer of anæsthesia, was a Christian.

ROUND 2.—Mr. Talmage set side by side the Bible account and the scientific hypothesis of the origin of the human race, and derived so much amusement from the contrast that the walls shook with laughter and applause. How would it sound, he asked, if, instead of the genealogy of man in the Bible, we should read that a mushroom begat a tadpole, a tadpole begat a pollywog, a pollywog begat a fish, a fish begat a reptil, a reptil begat a quadruped, a quadruped begat a baboon, and a baboon begat man? Herbert Spencer, however, was not present at the creation, and as the Lord was present, Dr. Talmage preferred the Lord's account of it. [Great applause.]

ROUND 3.—As for the widely accepted theory of the survival of the fittest, it was not true. Garfield died in September, and Guiteau survived him until the next June!

ROUND 4.—Finally, there has been no natural progress. Where can we find such horses nowadays as Job describes? Men once grew 10 feet high; now they reach to 6 1-2 feet. Once they lived to be from 200 to 900 years old; now 30 years. The truth is, natural evolution is downward in tendency. The Tombs of New York, Moyamensing prison in Philadelphia, Seven Dials in London, and the Cowgate in Edinburgh, are festering carbuncles on the face and neck of evolution. When you can evolve an oratorio out of a buzz saw, you can evolve something good out of the natural tendencies in human life. Evolution is an old heathen corpse set up in a morgue, and Spencer and Huxley are trying to galvanize it.

Canadian Notes.

J. Ick Evans lectured in Albert Hall last Sunday evening on the "History of Christianity and Other Religions." He traced the growth of the religious idea from its origin in animism and fetichism on through polytheism and culminating in monotheism. Out of the early forms of monotheism proceeded the Jewish religion as pictured in the Bible. Out of the Jewish religion, Buddhism, Brahmanism, and Parseeism, proceeded Christianity. Moses borrowed from the Egyptian, Chaldean, Babylonian, and Assyrian religions, and out of them he formulated the Jewish system of the Bible. When the Jews returned from captivity in Babylon, they brought with them the religious ideas of the Parsees, Buddhists, Brahmans, and other religions and philosophies of the eastern world of that day. The conquests of Alexander and the Romans made the religious ideas of the East familiar to the Jews of the time of Christ. And in this manner we get the sources and origin of Christianity.

As illustrating the religious superstition of the time of Christ, Taylor says Paul of Tarsus found in the city of Athens an altar erected to the unknown God, and, taking what Leclerc considers a justifiable liberty with the inscription, compliments the citizens on such a proof of their predisposition to receive the God which he propounded to them, or any other god, as well without evidence as with it, and to be converted without putting him to the trouble of working a miracle (Acts xvii, 22). The inhabitants of Lystra, on only hearing of the most equivocal and suspicious case of wonderment that could well be imagined, even that a lame beggar (who might hav been hired for the purpose, or probably had never been lame at all) had been cured, or imagined himself cured, by two entire strangers, itinerant therapeutæ, or tramping quack doctors, or medicin men, without either inquiry or doubt, they set up the cry, Jupiter and Mercury are come down from heaven in the shape of these tramping quack doctors, and with all these medicin men could do to check the intensity of their devotion, "scarce restrained they the people that they had not done sacrifice" (Acts xiv, 18).

The great Convention of Freethinkers from all parts of Canada, Dec. 13, 1884, is almost upon us. Tickets will be issued by all the railways at one and one-third fare from all parts of the dominion. The committee for decorating Albert Hall are busily at work. All the other committees work all day and sleep at night with one eye open.

The immoral and mischievous tendency of the doctrin of atonement for sin (so acceptable to guilty minds, and so eagerly embraced by the greatest monsters of iniquity) had been preached by self-interested priests and reprobated by all who wished well to mankind long before those scriptures are pretended to hav been written. Before the period assigned to the birth of Christ, the poet Ovid had assailed the demoralizing delusion with the most powerful shafts of philosophic scorn—"When thou thyself art guilty, why should a victim die for thee? What folly it is to expect salvation for the death of another!"

There is trouble in the Cook's church Presbyterian congregation, Toronto, between the pastor and his flock. A perfect flood of hard feelings, accompanied by showers of hard words, hav resulted from this fracas among the saints. "Let brotherly love continue."

When the apostolic therapeut, healer of the sick, wonder worker, and medicin man, Paul, attempted to preach the doctrin of Jesus Christ and him crucified, at Athens, he found the Athenians were already in possession of all he had to communicate, and that what he was endeavoring to set forth as a doctrin newly revealed, was with them a very old story. "He brought to their ears no new thing" (Act xvii, 18). The Epicurean and Stoical philosophers were more at home than himself upon that subject, and they called him a "babbler," the very term that most expresivly designates the character of a doting ignoramus, who, in the arrogance of his own conceit, will be for ever foisting up old stories, and swearing that they had occurred in his own experience, and had happened to nobody else but to some particular acquaintance of his. The majority, however, carried the vote that he should hav a fair hearing, and Paul was allowed to preach on the Areopagus. But the previous rebuke he had received had completely subdued his impertinence. He no more presumed to lay claim to originality in the crucifying-story business. He preached pure Deism; quoted their own facts; and never once ventured so much as to name his crucified Christ, or to make an allusion that could be construed as referring to him any more than to any other of the god-men, or men-gods who had arisen from the dead as well as he (Acts xviii).

The Toronto Daily World, in a leading article on Monday last, remarked that after the revival frenzy which has been going on in Toronto—after the boy-preacher and Moody—an Atheist convention is now in order. Every Freethinker who wants a Toronto daily paper should take the World.

Toronto, Dec. 13, 1884. R. B. BUTLAND.

The Liberal Club.

Last Friday was a rainy and dismal day, and when evening came the rain and dism visibly increased. The bright anticipation of hearing Mr. Isaac Cohen discourse on the Butler vote in the late presidential election, brought about one hundred people to the hall in spite of the weather. Many members of the club believed in the existence of a People's party previous to November 4th, and were desirous to know what became of it on that great day. But Mr. Cohen did not come. The chairman apologized for him, and likened him to the People's party on election day; that is, he did not make himself protuberant. Mr. Wakeman believed there were a few survivors of the People's party in the hall. If so, it would be appropriate, in the absence of Mr. Cohen, for such to assert themselvs. He suggested Mr. Huhn, or Mr. Palmer.

Mr. Palmer, whose name was on the electoral ticket of the People's party, here arose to say that he was a great admirer of Mr. Huhn, and Mr. Cohen, and himself, and all the Greenback orators, but he had grown weary of the subject. He suggested instead that Mr. Wakeman, who had just returned from Salamanca, might giv some account of the meeting, and a brief synopsis of his own speech at that place. This suggestion was put in the form of a motion, and carried unanimously. But the chairman was inexorable. We had come there to discuss the Butler vote, and the Butler vote must be discussed.

Mr. Huhn thereupon removed his coat, went at the subject in a business-like manner, and made a good speech. He was disappointed at the number of votes polled by Butler, but not disheartened. He should vote the People's party ticket for the remainder of his natural life. He was, first of all, a Greenbacker. It had been denied that the fiat of government could create a legal tender. How was it, then, that eleven cents' worth of copper, manufactured into one hundred cents by the government, were worth one dollar? Mr. Huhn prophesied that the election of Cleveland would disrupt the solid South, because the solid South expected much from the Democratic party and would get nothing.

Mr. Palmer believed that the cause of the smallness of Butler's vote could be found in the fact that monopolists bull-dozed the voters, and in the general belief that Butler had betrayed his party into the hands of the Republicans. He hoped that accusation was only a scandal; nevertheless, true or false, it had its effect. Again, many who believed in the People's party failed to support its candidate at the polls. The speaker, previous to election, addressed some eight hundred citizens of Port Chester on the necessity of a new party, and his most radical sentiments were enthusiastically applauded. Yet that great audience gave Butler scarcely twenty votes.

Mr. Sutherland said he had heard Greenbackers and members of the People's party talking about appealing to the cartridge box if the ballot box failed to work. He would like to know who would carry the guns. It behooved so insignificant a party to display greater modesty until they could muster more than a corporal's guard of followers. Mr. Huhn's definition of a dollar was not the correct one. A dollar must represent so many grains of gold or silver. Copper pennies were not a legal tender.

Dr. Weeks made a remarkably able speech touching the alleged morality of political parties. These were moved by a selfishness directed to ends a little higher than those previously attained. Men who marched to the South singing "John Brown's body lies moldering in the grave, his soul goes marching on," would hav hanged that gentleman a short time previously, and so the byword of one day became the rallying-cry of the next.

Mr. Freeland maintained that the People's party never existed save in the imagination of its leaders. The people were ignorant, unappreciativ, and were the enemies of their best friends. They were not equal to an understanding of the issues presented by the People's party. They were not prepared for them, could not rise to meet them, and consequently until the masses were educated there could be no party embodying high principles.

At the conclusion of Mr. Freeland's remarks Dr. Kinget arose to speak, whereupon this writer went home. The secretary's minutes show that several other speakers followed, among them Mr. Weston, who said that Butler's vote was dissipated by his own act, in that he repudiated his party, the Nationals, went to the Democratic Convention at Chicago as a delegate, and finally sold out to Blaine after lying indiscriminately all around. This meeting lacked the enjoyable qualities that it would hav had if Mr. Cohen could hav fulfilled his engagement. It was, notwithstanding, very instructiv and interesting. Next Friday Professor A. L. Rawson will speak on "The True Inwardness of Mythology, especially the Hebrew and Christian." The lecture will be illuminated by Dr. Foote's polyopticon.

Later.—TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am in receipt of the following card from Professor Vaughan, of Virginia. To hav one's motivs misconstrued in the way he seems to misconstrue mine is one of the saddest trials incident to a Christian life. It is all on a postal card:

F. R. Co-operativ Ass.
Estab. 1876. Dec. 8, 1884.

This F. R. Co-operativ Ass. is now printing 5,000 copies of Professor Vaughan's stinging answer to the scurrilous notice of his lecture—printed in a DIRTY SHEET missnamed "THE TRUTH SEEKER." It is hard for a person with the instincts of a gentleman to stoop to the low blackguard and liar who assaults him in print, who is too cowardly to meet him face to face, knowing that his foul carcass would repent the job. So far, among all decent Liberals, such as Rosenbourgh, Deane, and C. Palmer, the verdict is that such an article is a disgrace to Liberalism. I know that it is proof that I thrutfully struck home. The braggart Watts was well whipped. As to the statement about so-called prominent men only knowing me through the dirty TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Godwin would not hav it in his house. Mr. Swinton has written me as to his acquaintance with me, and I was a visitor years ago at their houses, where the scab who assails me cannot enter. That fact stings him. As to being half way to the penitentiary, I know better men in it than the spawn alluded to. Oh how bitter a son, presumably of a gentleman, can be when Jealous. By the time I get through with this he will be heartily sick of it.

GEORGE VAUGHAN.

P.S.—I hav a letter—another lie—written by the ——— spawn, to publish. WHAT A SET OF COWARDLY LYING TRASH.

Now, I regard the foregoing as unkind. I don't know much about Professor Vaughan, of Virginia, except that he is the author of a volume of poems bound in something like stove-lids and printed with the title page bottom-side up at the end of the book; and then sometimes I see him at the Liberal Club. He writes as though something I hav said has offended him, and as if he meant to jump upon my person the next time he sees it. To add injury to insult, he also will print 5,000 copies of his "stinging answer." This might be reckoned as the unkindest cut of all. Mr. Godwin, he remarks, will not hav THE TRUTH SEEKER in his house. That is because Mr. Godwin is not a subscriber. Terms, $3 per year; three months' trial subscription for fifty cents; sample copies free. Now is the time to get up clubs.

Row in a Colored Church.

Dr. Newman's church, in New York, is not the only sacred edifice in which there are internal dissensions. The black sheep belonging to the colored flock of Parson Jackson hav been lifting up rebellious hoofs against their shepherd, whacking each other over the pate with cotton umbrellas, and sampling each other's wool.

It seems the deacons wanted Parson Jackson to hunt up a fresh flock, but he thought his own flock was fresh enough to suit him, and refused to be counted out. The deacons, however, insisted that he was elected to go away, and Parson Jackson agreed to quit, provided his back salary was paid. A dispute arose about the amount, and Parson Jackson announced officially that he would continue to occupy the pulpit until he got the shekels. The deacons announced, also officially, that if the rector made any such attempt, they would "bust" him wide open. Jackson was not afraid. He intimated in language that was plain, that he had been aching for some time to lay out a few niggers, as he called the precious souls entrusted to his care. He would be grateful if they furnished him with the long coveted opportunity of sending them to Hades, so he said.

The next Sunday arrived, as is usual with all next Sundays. The deacons were on the inside. Parson Jackson, with a few stalwart friends, was on the outside. The insiders conversed with the outsiders. Parson Jackson said he was coming in to hold divine service in the sanctuary.

The deacons renewed their promis to mutilate the pastor if he attempted to appeal to the throne of grace from that pulpit. Jackson did not come in through the door of the sheep fold. He climbed in by some other way. A new green cotton umbrella, worth at least 50 cents, was shattered over his head. There was a sudden and violent laying on of hands. Tufts of wool floated in the air, and a little saddle-colored lamb took a generous bite out of the pastor's leg, the only instance in natural history of a lamb biting a calf. A venerable black ewe tried to gouge out the pastor's eye, but he managed to giv each one of them something by which to remember him. The speeches made were appropriate to the occasion.

After there was not a member of the congregation but had at least one sore place on his or her body, the police interfered, and both great political parties agreed to wait for the official count. According to the latest returns, Parson Jackson has been defeated by a small plurality, but he feels sore over the result. The place on his calf where the colored lamb bit him is a particularly sore spot.—Texas Siftings.

THE sabbatarians of England are wroth with John Bright because, on being asked to make a speech against the delivery of the mails on Sundays by carrier service, as on week-days, he rose up and made a rousing plea for the maintenance of the method.

The League.

How to Organize a Local League.

The National Liberal League is formed by the union of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues. To organize a Local Auxiliary League, any person (man or woman) may place the following Call at the head of a sheet of paper and solicit signatures:

CALL.

We, the undersigned citizens of [here introduce name of town or city], agree to organize an Auxiliary Liberal League, to work in connection with the National Liberal League, and to pay the sums set opposit our names for that purpose.

Names.	Residences.	Amounts.

As soon as ten persons have subscribed to this Call, and five dollars have been paid in, make out an application for a Charter, inclosing the application, together with a money order or postal note for five dollars (or the amount may be inclosed in a registered letter) to the secretary of the National Liberal League. The fee for a Charter is ten dollars, and the Board of Directors have voted to allow the organizer of the Auxiliary Liberal League to retain five dollars as compensation for his or her services in effecting the organization.

Any Liberal society can by a vote qualify itself an Auxiliary Liberal League, and take out a charter.

On receipt of the five dollars and application signed by the President and Secretary (or the temporary Secretary) of the new League (and as many others as may choose), the Secretary will forward to the applicant a Charter signed by the proper officers of the National Liberal League. Samuel P. Putnam,

Secretary of the National Liberal League.

Beginning of the Toronto Freethought Convention.

On Thursday, Dec. 11th, Mr. and Mrs. Watts and myself left New York city for the field-work of Liberalism beginning at Toronto, Canada. A night's ride brought us to Suspension Bridge, the Great Falls, and the verge of Canada. Without much circumlocution, we passed the good-natured officials of the Customs, and went speeding along the fair lake and through a well-cultivated country that seemed to hav a quiet spirit hovering over it, not quite so impetuous and busy as that which pervades the atmosphere of the states. About 10 A.M. we arrived at Hamilton, Canada—a city of 40,000 inhabitants, that lies in straggling fashion with all sorts of curiously built houses along the hill-sides and the shores of Ontario. We were met at the station, and heartily welcomed, by Mr. and Mrs. Littlehales, and taken to their hospitable mansion, whose large rooms seemed to giv a royal English greeting. An hour was spent in happy talk, and I must confess that my first impression of the Canada Secularists was most delightful and inspiring. I felt at home at once in their large liberality and broad spirit. Mr. Littlehales is doing great service to our cause in Hamilton and the neighboring country. Through many struggles, the Secular Society of Hamilton is advancing to assured triumph.

At one o'clock we resumed our journey, and arrived at Toronto. Mr. and Mrs. Watts were enthusiastically greeted at the station by a large company of ladies and gentlemen, which to all of us was both a surprise and pleasure, showing how deeply Mr. Watts had impressed himself upon the social life of the place, and how ready those who had listened to his utterances were to respond to his efforts in their behalf. It was a beautiful welcome also to Mrs. Watts, and no doubt made her think that Toronto was almost as good, if not quite as large, as London, and that there would be no want of vivacity in her social relations, and her own ardent and joyous spirit and intellectual brilliancy would find a happy response from cheerful fellow-laborers.

In the evening there was an informal reception at the rooms of Mr. Evans, president of the Freethought Association, and it was a notable gathering of congenial workers. Remsburg was there, fresh from his Western campaign, and brought good news of progress. We met there some of the leading members of the Toronto society—Mr. Strange, Mr. Harrison, Hicks, Butland, and others, who, together with Mr. Evans and Mr. Risser, hav kept the banner of Freethought afloat, and rallied a goodly company beneath its folds, and hav made victory only a question of time.

Saturday morning the Liberals and delegates from various parts of the province came in, Mr. Sisson, of Port Hope; Mr. Young, of Hamilton; Mr. Algie, of Alton; Mr. Chantler, of Willard, and others. The utmost enthusiasm prevails, and there is no doubt of a most successful meeting. All are in favor of the unity of Liberalism between Canada and the states, thus making a vast American organization that shall be a persistent and wonderful power for freedom and growth. Everywhere I find evidences of the noble work acccomplished by Mr. Watts. In Hamilton and Toronto especially he has created the utmost interest, and even Christians are beginning to realize that something is going on, and that the world moves in spite of them, and they are really anxious to know what Secularism is and what it purposes to do. Moody and the boy-preacher, Harrison, hav been here for the past few weeks, and hav stirred things up in their way, and reasonable minds are ready for food of a more substantial sort, and no doubt they will compare Secularism favorably with this morbid and modern form of Christianity which must draw its life entirely from emotion and good story telling.

Enough for this week. Next week the readers of The Truth Seeker shall hav a full account of this convention, which will be in its results the most fruitful ever held in Canada, and will mark an epoch in the advance of Secularism.

Fraternally yours, Samuel P. Putnam.

Brief Correspondence.

George T. Hogle, Walnut Grove, Arizona: Does the League still giv certificates of membership on receipt of one dollar, as before the last convention at Cassadaga? I was a member last year, and think of remaining this year. Two of my friends also wish to join.

Reply.—The League still accepts members on the same terms. It encourages annual memberships.

F. F. Follett (the earnest worker and secretary of Illinois State League): "I hav read with interest your articles, and those of Putnam, Watts, and others in the Liberal papers, and hope you will be able to work up a more lively interest in the cause."

Constructiv Work in the League.

From the Missouri Liberal.

When we consider the unnatural demands of the church's creeds, and the ridiculous inconsistencies of their authority, we wonder how the structure could stand in the face of rapidly developing reason and research. But when we consider the absorbing social desires of mankind, it becomes apparent that to this the church owes its vitality as a living institution, in spite of all that in common sense is against it. Here men, women, and children can meet and enjoy each other's presence, after the services indulge in short chats, compliments, and such other recognition as is common and pleasant in congregated humanity. Here also is furnished a stage upon which each one can act his or her ideal part as a member of society; whether it is as moralist, teacher, example in deportment, fashion or the various other reasons for which people appear in public. In the popular church-going mind, the creed and authority that it is based on are lost sight of entirely. This answers every practical purpose; as they pay their share of the expenses required, and help to swell the throng which makes up the church in what is termed its strength.

The League, in its scope, could greatly outdo the church if it would only supply in its operations this social opportunity permanently, by organizing constructive work that would interest, and occupy part of the Sundays and other days of recreation for Liberals and their children. This would not only entertain them, but with its intellectual and progressiv features added to the social, and absence of orthodox conformity, would attract in addition that element of society which is never found in the church and does not support it. When society in general would see the advantage of natural sociability and entertainment over that instituted and fostered in the creed-bound church, it would soon fall in and giv Liberalism such a boom as it can never receive by the logic of a few speakers and Liberal papers with no local impetus to excite a demand for them. The leaders could, by having a proper manual giving explicit and plain directions for conducting the work, organize in every locality where there are even a few Liberals. Such work, which would be carried on by the few till its advantages becoming apparent, would induce the many, who know nothing of Liberalism, to unite their social and material strength. This auxiliary effort with its proselyting and material interest, would furnish the national movement and journals with a support that would, through preparation for progression, unloosen every shackle of the less experienced past from present advancement, and do it in a complete and rapid manner. Example or practice is the most potent motor that can be brought to bear; especially when it is in harmony with the natural desires and common sense of the masses.

Such text books for the children of various ages, as well as older people, as we hav tried here and found satisfactory can be had, and would no doubt prove desirable in any community or neighborhood, and the same success be attained. We hav many people here who hav been brought from orthodoxy entirely by the superiority of our entertainment over that which they had been accustomed to in the church, and they are among the most activ workers of our society. This can be the case everywhere if the workers can be started in the right direction, and hav a tried guide to construct their work by. In the "Sunday Instruction," both old and young hav courses suited to their capacity of receiving or discussing, so that all come away having learned something and had an excellent social time. In the evening a general meeting is held for the entertainment of old and young Liberals and that of strangers, of which great numbers are to be seen at every meeting, always filling the hall to its fullest capacity. The exercises consist of select readings, recitations, songs, and five-minute speeches by any who are called upon or volunteer a few remarks. In the morning all hav an opportunity to express their opinion on the question for discussion (which is selected by the group), and the pleasure of changing it often by having other phases of the question presented that they had not heard before. These questions generally pertain to matters of interest either in every-day affairs about us or abstract theories or philosophies and their probable effect on the human race and its happiness. In the evening the many are entertained by a few, necessitating no effort on the part of the audience but to hear. Thus we hav every social advantage of the church, and superior intellectual and natural ones, supplanting it completely in every sense. This is what the League should and could do if it would pursue a similar course. It has able workers in attracting public notice, and if this constructiv work established by them to giv it permanency and create an interest that would supplant the church, a work could be accomplished that can be done in no other way nor by any other organization. Our people would be happy to render any help in the way of our experience here in constructiv work, if the workers in the League see fit to giv. the matter attention. A manual could easily be gotten up that would cover the ground completely, and in such a plain manner that it would of itself be all that would be needed to conduct the work, after the lecturer had awakened an interest and started it.

Religious toleration is now partially established in Cuba. Sen. Pedro Duarte having commenced Protestant teaching in Matanzas, complaint was made against him by the Roman Catholic vicar, and the case was carried up to the Madrid government. The royal decree, while declaring the Roman Catholic religion to be "official," proclaims permission for "the exercise of any other worship not opposed to Christian morals." The significant conclusion reached is thus set forth: "It is therefore plain that the state protects the Catholic religion as its own; but at the same time it establishes the toleration of other forms of worship, guaranteeing the right to exercise those forms of worship against all kinds of aggression whatever." By these official declarations "the free exercise of religious worship is permitted in Spain to all its inhabitants, whether they be nationals or foreigners." The open teaching of Freethought, however, would probably bring upon the teacher physical punishment and social ostracism. The Truth Seeker subscribers in that country hav to keep quiet, yet that is called religious liberty by Christians!

Of W. S. Bell's lecture at Muskegon, Mich., the Workingman's Journal said: "Professor W. S. Bell delivered a very extraordinary lecture last evening, before a large audience in the Maccabee's Hall at Lakeside, entitled, 'Common Sense from a Religious Standpoint.' Professor Bell is pronounced by everyone who has attended his lectures to be one of the finest speakers that has visited this city for a long time. His theme is not only a fascinating one, but is grounded upon those eternal truths which modern civilization has just commenced to realize are most pertinent to its advancement and the well-being of good society. Everyone of his lectures is argumentativ in the extreme, and made up of the most scholarly thought. He will lecture at the Opera House next Sunday at 2 o'clock. Everyone desiring to be highly entertained should go and hear him."

The Son of David.

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch."—Jer. xxiii, 5.

All the prophecies of the Old Testament on which the Jews built their expectations of a Messiah, speak of a descendant in the direct line from David. When the followers of Jesus clained for their master that those prophecies were fulfilled in his person, it became therefore of the utmost importance to prove, if possible, that he was possessed of that necessary qualification. He was known as the son of Joseph, a village carpenter, and it is not probable that the genealogy of so humble an individual would be very accurately preserved. No proofs existing, they had to be invented. The authors of the gospels according to Matthew and Luke perceived this necessity, and each attempted to construct a pedigree in his own way. Whichever was written first, it is obvious that the compiler of the second was unaware of its existence. The two witnesses present such hopeless contradictions as would totally invalidate their testimonies in any court of justice in the world. Believers in scripture are, in the majority of cases, so little given to compare one passage with another, that they read both statements without perceiving how utterly irreconcilable they are. They hav forgotten Matthew before they arrive at Luke. Let the two tables be placed together, and the dullest comprehension must perceive their contradictions. Not only do the names disagree, but the number of families is hopelessly at variance. Thus:

According to Matthew.	According to Luke.
1. Joseph was the son of	1. Joseph was the son of
2. Jacob, who was the son of	2. Heli, who was the son of
3. Matthan, "	3. Matthat, "
4. Eleazar, "	4. Levi, "
5. Eliud, "	5. Melchi, "
6. Achim, "	6. Janna, "
7. Sadoc, "	7. Joseph, "
8. Azor, "	8. Mattathias, "
9. Eliakim, "	9. Amos, "
10. Abiud, "	10. Naum, "
11. Zorobabel, "	11. Esli, "
12. Salathiel, "	12. Nagge, "
13. Jechonias, "	13. Maath, "
14. Josias, "	14. Mattathias, "
15. Amon, "	15. Semei, "
16. Manasses, "	16. Joseph, "
17. Ezekias, "	17. Juda, "
18. Achaz, "	18. Joanna, "
19. Joathan, "	19. Rhesa, "
20. Ozias, "	20. Zorobabel, "
21. Joram, "	21. Salathiel "
22. Josaphat, "	22. Neri, "
23. Asa, "	23. Melchi, "
24. Abia, "	24. Addi, "
25. Roboam, "	25. Cosam, "
26. Solomon, "	26. Elmodam, "
27. David.	27. Er, "
	28. Jose, "
	29. Eliezer, "
	30. Jorim, "
	31. Matthat, "
	32. Levi, "
	33. Simeon, "
	34. Juda, "
	35. Joseph, "
	36. Jonan, "
	37. Eliakim, "
	38. Melea, "
	39. Menan, "
	40. Mattatha, "
	41. Nathan, "
	42. David.

This is not all. If the two gospels agreed, they would furnish no evidence of the descent of Jesus from David. They only trace that of Joseph, and both assert that Jesus was not his son. This was evidently an afterthought, and was introduced at a subsequent period when a further claim was made for the divine origin of the son of Mary. It could not be of the slightest consequence whether Joseph was of the line from David or not if he was not the father of Jesus. But we do not stop even here. The author of Luke's gospel denies that Jesus was of the house of David at all. Having no human father, the blood of the lecherous old king could reach his veins only through those of his mother. David was of the tribe of Judah, but Mary was the cousin of Elizabeth, who, we are told, (Luke, i, 5,) "was of the daughters of Aaron," and therefore of the tribe of Levi. The argument, therefore, stands thus:

The Messiah was to be of the house of David, of the tribe of Judah;

Jesus was of the house of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi;

Therefore, Jesus was not the Messiah.

The Meeting at Salamanca.

The actual value of conventions of Liberals to the cause of Freethought depends on the amount of public interest excited, and the consequent reports of the press. And this fact should never be lost sight of when deciding on time and place of holding meetings.

Salamanca is not a suitable place for yearly meetings. Last year the meeting was held during holiday week, and had the advantage of novelty, and the prestige of the great, successful convention at Rochester—due to the enterprise and energy of Elias H. Gault, who secured subscriptions from the business men and aroused to enthusiasm the best Liberal element of the city. This year the novelty no longer existed, and the Cassadaga meeting was adverse, rather than favorable, to a large attendance at the next meeting, wherever held.

There was really no demand, local or otherwise, for the meeting at this time. Brother H. L. Green's serious sickness incapacitated him for that vigorous and energetic work by which he has sometimes secured success in the past, and possibly clouded his judgment, making "the wish the father to the thought" in regard to people attending.

From the commencement to the close of the meeting the weather was unfavorable; from Friday evening until Sunday night there were incessant heavy rains, with scarce a half-hour of intermission.

Under these circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the attendance was meager. Yet all present expressed themselvs as having enjoyed a most instructiv and interesting time. The brilliant poetic description of "The Church of the Future" by Mr. S. P. Putnam, and the intensely interesting and elevating masterpiece of logic and eloquence by that very able and deservedly honored and beloved leader in the school of Positiv philosophy, Mr. T. B. Wakeman, well repaid the longest journey, and no expense could be considered in view of the priceless instruction, hope, courage, and incentiv to higher, better, and more useful life inculcated.

The Opera House, really a dismal, gloomy, and uninviting place, was transformed into a fairy bower by the tasteful decorations made by the ladies' committee. Beautiful pictures adorned the walls of the auditorium. Some of the choicest gems were from the pencil of that fair, energetic devotee to liberty, art, and melody, Mrs. Mina Seymour. The stage was festooned with national flags, rare and beautiful ferns, and bright flowers. To the right and left, on parlor easels, were life-sized portraits—to the left, that of the noble and heroic champion of liberty in the past, Thomas Paine; to the right, the noble and heroic champion of liberty in the present, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll.

The music was under the direction of that deservedly popular maestro and prince of jolly good fellows, A. D. Lane, of Olean, N. Y., assisted by Mrs. H. O. Wait, Mrs. M. C. Fitts, Mrs. Dr. Colgrove, of Salamanca, and Miss Emma Smith, of Titusville, Pa. Pianist, Mrs. Mina Seymour, assisted by. James V. Schmitz.

The meeting opened on Thursday evening, Dec. 4th, with a concert by the choir, followed by a lecture by Mr. Charles Watts, of England. Admission free. About three hundred were present.

Mr. Watts delivered a most able exposition of Freethought, what it is, its aims and objects. The earnest eloquence of his delivery aroused and riveted the attention, while his clear, logical presentation of facts and arguments carried conviction even to the most devout Christians present, and could not but tend to uproot their prejudice and incite them to thought and investigation.

Friday morning at 10, although the attendance was very small, all heartily enjoyed the excellent conference meeting and mutual interchange of views and experiences, after which Mr. J. H. Burnham, of Michigan—who presided as chairman of the meeting, his characteristic suavity and dignity, so admirably blending, enabling him to fill the arduous position to the satisfaction of all—delivered an impressiv appeal that all do their best each and every day, so that we might enjoy the precious boon of peaceful, sweet sleep, that surely follows a day well spent.

Friday afternoon, Mr. Charles B. Reynolds delivered a very able and interesting lecture on "Secularization through Organization." Despite the depressing influence of so slim an attendance, Mr. Reynolds aroused all present to enthusiasm as he unfolded the plans of the National Liberal League for insuring efficient organization of Liberals of all shades of opinion on the platform of Secularization and Nine demands. Mr. Reynolds gained glowing encomiums from all present, and much regret was expressed that all the Liberals of the state could not hav heard, and thus been aroused to activ co-operation in the good work.

Friday evening, Mr. J. H. Burnham lectured on the "Changes in Christianity." The rain descended in torrents, and effectually dampened the ardor of the townspeople, so that they failed to attend, much to their own loss, for Mr. Burnham gave an admirable lecture, full of good points. He held that there is an essential and irreversible distinction between the true and the untrue; that of contradictions only one can be true, and hence that among the contradictory sects all but one must be wrong; that the theory of a supernatural revelation of positiv doctrin cannot possibly admit of the least diversity of opinion as to what that doctrin is, among the people to whom it is addressed; that the work of establishing a religious system on earth for the instruction and salvation of man, if God's work, cannot hav been so bunglingly done that they for whom it is intended may honestly be at fault as to where and what it is; that either God did or did not giv a dogmatic Christianity. If there is positiv doctrin in the case, then it must be as binding now as when given. Yet we find the doctrins of the church changed, altered, or forsaken to suit the genius of the age.

Mr. Burnham declared religion was neither more or less than a disease, and he hated, loathed the very word, and all that pertained to it.

This called out from Mrs. Stearns the declaration that Mr. Burnham had swallowed a little Freethought, and it had acted on him as an emetic; made him spew up all the little religion he ever had, and when he looked at it, so foul and disgusting, no wonder he thought everybody who had anything like it must necessarily be horribly diseased. This called out a rousing defense of his position from the gentle chairman in the evening.

Saturday morning, a conference meeting was held. Mr. H. L. Green proposed to hav a Freethought school in Salamanca; he claimed a suitable site for a Liberal college would be donated, and proposed to solicit by letter every Liberal whose address he could obtain, to write him how many shares at $25 per share they would take in the enterprise. No money to be paid until the full amount of $25,000 was first subscribed, and he hoped by the annual meeting of the association to hav the entire amount pledged.

Saturday afternoon, Mr. J. H. Burnham and Mrs. Stearns, of Buffalo, occupied the rostrum.

Saturday evening, Mr. C. B. Reynolds explained the needs, advantages, and mode of operation of tent meetings for summer work, and, awaiting the arrival of Mr. S. P. Putnam (train delayed), spoke on the justice of the Nine Demands, and the need that all true Liberals should heartly co-operate in working for the Secularization of our government. His suggestions were original, unique, but thoroughly practical, and gave evidence not alone of his natural ability as an organizer, but that he had given deep thought, and thoroughly mastered this most difficult subject.

Mr. Putnam arrived at 9:15, very weary, wet, and muddy on account of a mile and a half tramp over the track from the Bradford depot through the pouring rain, so as not to disappoint the meeting. He gave a glowing, cheery speech of fifteen minutes, portraying the glorious results that most follow harmonious effort in sustaining the National Liberal League.

Sunday, the last fond hope to which all had clung, if not fine weather, at least cessation of the constant downpouring of rain, was drowned—dark, cold, dismal, drenching rain from morn till night, only getting each time a little more violent just about time for the meetings.

In the afternoon Mr. S. P. Putnam delivered his grand poetical picture of "The Church of the Future." That he entranced the audience with the beautiful scenes he brought so vividly before them by the genius of his poetic thought so earnestly expressed goes without saying. He wove the most lovely garlands of the beautiful flowers of poesy, and with rare artistic skill wreathed and festooned them around the solid iron columns of fact and logic in a manner that at once fascinated and bewildered with delight. He was rapturously applauded, and many declared if they had only heard that one speech it would hav repaid them for all—aye, ten times over, for all the outlay of time and money incurred by attending the meeting.

In the evening, Mr. T. B. Wakeman gave one of the best and grandest efforts conceivable. No words of scribe can do justice to the matter; no description convey anything like an idea of the manner. If one could hav heard such a being as good Christians suppose their Christ to hav been, giving instruction to his disciples, just such were the simple, earnest, loving words of wisdom and truth that fell from Mr. Wakeman's lips, and just such the wrapt attention of the listeners. It was instructiv, ennobling, filling the heart with intense desire to attain to that perfection of character that should adorn the high profession of Liberalism, and inciting all to firm resolves to liv better, purer, and more useful lives. It is earnestly hoped the lecture will be published in full, although even then half its wonderful thrilling effect and powerful influence for good will be lost by the lack of the presence and magnetism of the speaker.

No words of praise can exceed the deservings of the choir. The gloom of the weather and discouragement of slim attendance could not counteract the genial influence of the beautiful music so admirably rendered by the choir. Where all did so well it were invidious to particularize; but why so exquisit a singer, so accomplished a musician, as Mrs. H. O. Wait should bury her grand, glorious gift of voice between the dark, dismal hills of this dull, smoky, wretched little village, when there is demand in our own great cities, as well as the capitals of Europe, for such singers as prima donnas in opera, where bright fame and ample fortune are showered on artists that are far her inferior in richness of tone and compass of voice, is a mystery unfathomable.

In numbers this meeting was a failure, some of the speakers, in lieu of payment for services, paying their own hotel bills. But in unexcelled excellence of every appointment it was a grand success. Hereafter we trust better counsels will prevail in selection of time and place, so that so much of great ability shall not again be so lavishly squandered.

The Social Revolution

Consists in substituting the industrial or economic order for the governmental, feudal, or military, even as this by a previous revolution had been substituted for the theocratic or sacerdotal.

By industrial order we understand, not a form of government in which men concerned in farming and mechanic arts, contractors, proprietors of the soil, and workmen, would be the ruling class, as were formerly the nobility and clergy, but a constitution of society having for its base, instead of the hierarchy of political powers, the organization of economic forces.

The political principle lately reproduced under the name of direct legislation is a false application of the principle of authority, the true seat of which is in the family, and which cannot consistently extend to the commune or to the nation.

Society has undergone a change of tendency by the idea of substituting gradually in the workingmen's associations the principle of reciprocity, as at once a law and an economic force.

In our political traditions we hav ever found opposed to each other the idea of government and that of mutual contract, the only moral tie that free and equal beings can accept.

The essentials of the revolution are:

Its cause: The economic disorder which the revolution of 1789 left after it.

Its motiv: A progressiv and systematic misery, which government, whether willingly or unwillingly, promotes and maintains.

Its organic principle: Reciprocity, or the contract.

Its aim: Guarantee of labor and wages, with the progressiv increase of wealth and liberty.

Its parties: The associativ schools, and the democratic factions still attached to centralization of the state.

Its adversaries: Partisans of the statu quo, capitalist, theologic, stock-jobbing governmental—in a word, those who liv by prejudice and privilege. The intellectual history of the revolution consists in deducing the idea, at once economic and juridical, of reciprocity in contract, defining the difficulties and oppositions which this deduction must meet from sects and parties, either revolutionary or reactionary, and explaining the whole system of reforms or new institutions, in which work finds its security, property its measure, commerce its balance, and government its leave of absence.

We must arrest the disorganizing tendency left by the former revolution, and proceed with the principle of reciprocity to the liquidation of established interests of the social revolution, which summons both to abdicate. But if the church, lacking political sanction, fails to preserve the direction of ideas; if the state, shorn of the aureole of "right divine," can no longer master private interests (the baronies of capital), then true fusion is still more chimerical than that of constitutional governments with absolutism. What liberty has sundered, authority will not reunify.

By virtue of what right does the state, indifferent to ideas and worships, the state Atheist, like the law, pretend to administer interests?

It is answered, that the citizens and the communes (townships) being unable to agree about general interests, need an arbiter superior in power. . . . No reasoning out of this circle; antagonism of interests, fatal, inevitable, the motiv; centralization, ordinating and hierarchical, the conclusion.

By its fruits ye shall know it.

(In France, for example, about '52) the number of officers under government was 568,365, not comprising the army and navy. Such is the civil army of agents, guardians, overseers, holding the people in the net of power, maintained at their expense to defend itself against the malcontents, and the assaults of thought still more formidable than arms. Such is the arbiter imposed on us by centralization. Think you that complete anarchy would not be kindlier to our peace, our labor, and our prosperity, than a million of parasites armed against our liberties and interests?

The double army of the state is not all. By the very fact the existence of this force at the orders of the state, the opposition, whether dynastic or republican, has on its side an army still more numerous, consisting of all individuals without employment, malcontents, coveting the offices of the state and working against the party in power. Thus, civic war in permanence—on the one side, between the officials and the industrial population; on the other, between the government and the opposition. What think you of this order? . . . In Great Britain and the United States, reckon in this warfare, the expenses of election, a tribute indirectly levied upon labor by political parties.

As the religion of the state is the violation of conscience, administrativ centralization is the castration of liberty. The former has engendered the Inquisition; the latter, the police. . . . That government, treating the people as a minor, should pretend, at its expense, and under pretext of disaccord between its faculties and tendencies, to administer its property, judge of what suits its interests, measure its movement, liberty, and life—this would be inconceivable, and would betray infernal machination, did we not know by the history of all governments that the people, ever ignorant of the laws of order, has been the accomplice of power.

Government, of which it has made a directing principle, is, the people confesses, but the supplement of its own reason. As between the inspiration of his conscience and the tyranny of his instincts, man has given himself a mystical moderator in the priest, so, between his liberty and that of his neighbor, he has imposed upon himself an arbiter in the judge; thus between his private and the general interest, supposed as irreconcilable as his instinct and reason, he has sought another reconciler in the government. Man has thus alienated his moral character and his judicial dignity; he has abdicated his initiativ, and made himself the slave of impostors and tyrants.

But since Jesus, Isaiah, David, and even farther back, it has been admitted that the just needs neither sacrifice nor priest. Will it be more difficult for us, in the accomplishment of our civic and social duties, to dispense with the state's intervention?

We hav exhibited the industrial economy as the accord of interests resulting from the liquidation of debts and mortgages, consequent on the reduction of rent and interest by the People's Real Estate and Labor Exchange banks, or legislativ acts rendering every payment of interest a mortgage on the principal, in favor of the payer; from the abolition of the tariffs on money, the representation of all values in the circulating medium, the facility of credit to all honest industry, the organization of economic forces, the creation of workingmen's companies, and the true constitution of property.

In this state of things what is the use of government? The contract resolves every social problem. The producer treats with the consumer, the associate with his company, the farmer with his township, the township with the county, the county with the district, the district with the state, etc., i. e., the principle of mutual contracts once established, it is maintained through any desirable combination of local autonomies for purposes commercial or defensiv. The secret of this equation between the citizen and the state, i. e., between the individual and the collectiv sovereignties, lies in the economic equation made previously (by abolishing capitalist interest) between the workingman and the contractor, the farmer and the landlord. Banish, by reciprocal obligations, the old-time servitude to its last vestige; then citizens and communes no longer need the government to administer their property, to construct harbors and bridges, wharves, canals, roads, and markets, to arbitrate their differences, to instruct, direct, control, and censure their agents; for all acts of guardianship, vigilance, preservation, and police; for the judgment of criminals and prevention of crime (supposing evil tendencies to survive government), which either encourages or provokes them by its privileges and oppressions.

To conclude: Administrativ centralization was intelligible under the old-time monarchy, when the king, chief of the barons, had become, by virtue of his right divine, the sole judiciary, sole executiv, and general proprietor. But since the revolution, since the people hav reclaimed its right through divers constitutional instruments and representations; to pretend that the county, or every locality in matters concerning it, has not the right to rule, administrate, judge, and govern itself, and under pretext of the unity and indivisibility of the republic, to confiscate from the people the disposition of its means of action; after having overthrown despotism by insurrection, to re-establish by metaphysics, to ostracize those who reclaim in behalf of liberty and local sovereignty, is to lie to the spirit of the revolution; it is to deny progress.

Centralization, which prevailed in '93, over the constitution—thanks to Robespierre and the Jacobins—is only feudalism under another form; it is the application of algebra to tyranny. Napoleon, who put the last stroke to it, attested this.

M. Ledru-Rollin's last declaration for direct government is a return toward the true revolutionary tradition, just as Louis Blanc's protest against what he calls Girondism, is the first cry of governmental reaction. The constitution of '93, it is the Gironde, it is Danton; the representativ system—it is the Jacobin club, it is Robespierre. Sixty years' experience has taught us what to think of the unity and indivisibility of their republic.

As to the constitution of '93, if it marked the movement toward a different order of things, if it may be useful now to recall its dispositions and tendencies, it can no longer serve as an exemplar. The revolution has marched on. We are indeed (1851) in the line of this constitution, but we are sixty years ahead of it. P. J. PROUDHON, by EDGEWORTH.

In this extract I hav sacrified pages very impressiv as addressed in '51, by a Frenchman to Frenchmen, but which hav now less pertinence to the United States. In the condensation necessary for a newspaper article, I hav had regard only to useful effect, referring the student of history to the original. E.

The Revenue Question Again.

I had nearly completed a reply to "N. G. W.'s" article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 22d, but on reading it over I felt that it would be a waste of space in the paper, and that I could do better by writing an an article on the original question without confining myself to a reply to him.

I am not afraid of "N. G. W." deceiving the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Most of them are accustomed to handling sophisms, and are pretty competent judges of truth. One of them writes to me: "Your article on landlordism is pretty severely criticised; still the force of the criticism is more in a certain style than in argument." I presume this writer expresses the opinion of nine-tenths of the readers of the discussion.

My statements about the lands in Michigan were taken from a pamphlet, "Michigan and Its Resources," by the State Commissioner of Immigration, 1882. He reports 36,755,200 acres of land in the state; 6,374,385 acres improved, 1,717,246 acres belonging to the United States, 861,185 acres belonging to the state, 3,430,115 acres belonging to railroad and canal companies. In only 12 counties, out of the 79 in the state, is one half of the land improved, and in none of them is it much more than half improved. There is very little waste or useless land in Michigan, and I see no reason why private individuals should seek to own it.

I presume I committed an oversight in stating what I regard as a fundamental law in political economy. I will now state it as I intended to do in my previous article, and "N. G. W." is welcome to all the advantage the change givs him: Whatever wealth any person acquires without earning it, or getting it as a gift from some person who has an exclusiv right to it, gets wealth which some other person or persons must hav earned but did not get; and this is what is vulgarly called theft.

Much confusion of thought exists in consequence of people failing to perceive the difference between two very different kind of things—natural things and things which are the product of human labor. The man who makes anything, whether it be a suit of clothes some article of furniture, some labor-saving machine or any improvement on land, as the erection of a house, barn, mill, or factory, or the planting of an orchard, or the raising of any kind of grain, or fruit, or horses, cattle, sheep, or hogs, has acquired a very different kind of title to those things to any which can be acquired to any of the natural things of the earth, as land, mines, natural timber, game, or fish. The title to the former class of things depends upon the fact of their existence. They would not hav existed but for the labor, skill, or care of the producer. It is, therefore, evident that the producer should be allowed to do with this kind of property as he pleases. His title to this kind of property should be absolute, and this is why I insist that it should not even be taxed.

But the title to the other kind of things does not depend upon any person's labor, but upon a deed which the owner, or some of his ancestors, or some assigner, has bought or received of the government, and which the possessor regards as a fetich, and conceives that it justly entitles him, his heirs, and assigns forever, to hav and to hold the exclusiv possession of a certain portion of this planet. The deed may be signed by George Washington, the first president of the United States; but George Washington was only president for eight years, and are we going to be ruled by an ex-president, and by a dead president, to all eternity? Just think of people a thousand years from now claiming certain privileges on this planet because their ancestors served in the Revolutionary war! Just think of some one claiming the exclusiv privilege of a million dollars' worth of this planet lying in the city of New York, because his ancestors paid one hundred and twenty-five dollars to Thomas Jefferson. Why, anyone who can swallow this can surely swallow the story of Jonah being swallowed by the whale, or even that of Jonah swallowing the whale. Any one can believe this should easily believe the story of Peter having the keys of heaven and hell.

Natural things are a free gift to all alike, and no person can be any more justly deprived of his equal share in them than he can of his freedom or his life. Indeed, his life and liberty both depend upon his getting access to these things. Neither the king upon his throne, nor the president of a republic, nor parliament, nor Congress, nor a majority of the people, nor any power on earth, can justly deprive any one citizen of his equal share of these natural things. The humblest citizen has as good a claim to them as the proudest emperor, for the existence of these things depends as much upon one as the other. They were in existence before the creation of man, and will remain when man has left nothing but traces in the stratified rocks.

The proper functions of a just government in respect to these natural things is to see that they are forever evenly, fairly, and justly distributed among all the people. Because one man is richer, wiser, stronger, more cunning, or more industrious than another, is no reason why he should receive a larger share of these things, because they do not depend upon any quality which he possesses, or upon anything which he has done. Therefore, a government which devises any means of distributing these things so that all do not share alike in them is not a just government.

Nor is it possible to make a division of these things that will remain just to all eternity, or even for one century. What would we think of a sailor who should pretend to set the rudder of a ship so exact at New York that it would not need changing until it arrived at Liverpool? Yet even this would be easier than to make a just division of the natural things of the country which would not need changing in less than a century. Every hour some are dying, and need their share no more, and others are being born crying for room and fair play. The government should therefore only grant privileges for brief periods, probably for not longer than one year.

Governments hav no right to giv privileges to any one, and if they do giv privileges to any one citizen for less than the privilege is worth, they do so at the expense and to the detriment of all other citizens.

Let us suppose Mr. A to be the father of ten sons, and the owner of one thousand acres of land. Seven of the sons hav married and are doing for themselvs, and three of them remain at home with the father. The old man finally calls them all to his side, and tells them that he may not liv much longer, and he wants to divide his estate among them. Now, suppose that one of the three who had remained at home should say that he thought his brothers who had left should not get any of the father's estate, that they had entered professions and engaged in business, and that they did not need any land, and would not liv on it if they had it, and advise the father to divide the thousand acres of land equally among the three who had remained at home. What would the father say to such a proposal? Would he not say that he would divide his estate equally among all his sons?

Now this might be a somewhat difficult thing to do, since some portions of the land might be much more valuable than others. Let us suppose now that the father should say to them that he wished the farm never to be divided, and he wished to leave the estate so they could not sell it, as some of the sons might spend his share and then be reduced to want; and for that reason he would leave it so that it should be rented every year to the highest bidder, and that he wished them all to meet on the farm every Christmas and hav a good time, at the end of which the rent of the farm would be divided equally among all. What objections could the sons hav to this proposition?

Now, this is about how I think the grand old estate called the United States should be divided among all citizens. But it would not be necessary to rent the land every year to the highest bidder. It would only be necessary to hav the assessors do as they do now—appraise the value of each man's estate, assessing only the land, and not the improvements, and collect say six per cent of such value as rent, for public purposes. In this way every person would be asked to pay to the public only the value of the privilege obtained from them. J. G. MALCOLM.

Anno Scientiæ 284.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you please allow me a little space to reply to friend Kozly in regard to the above era?

He says that it would now be 285, instead of 284. I am very, very sorry that he has not the advantage of "any schoolboy who has passed arithmetic," for if he had, he would then know that it will not be 285 until this year is completed. It was not the year 1 until the twelve months of the first year had actually passed away; and it will not be the year 285 until the twelve months of this year hav passed away.

Also, if he had only stopped to think, he would realized that there are many sects and nations that do not use the Christian era. As far as one counting from the earliest time is concerned, it would not be practicable, for it is impossible to decide what that date is. Therefore, I say, for one, that as we must hav a date that should be universal, let us hav one starting from a real epoch, and one that has common sense to back it up—not one that dates from a humbug era.

With best wishes to friend Kozly, who, evidently, is not very well posted in "figgers," I am,

Yours fraternally, REMLY S. SIDELINGER.

Evolution and Christianity.

The writer of the following letter is a fair representativ of a large number of people whose hearts are too kind to accept Christianity in its sterner aspects, but who, without troubling themselvs too much about definitions of words, or the logic of facts, still think they are Christians:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your editorial of Dec. 6th, on the statistics of Christianity rendered by the Plenary Council at Baltimore, I find an assertion to which I take exception.

"You say 'to put it broadly, and yet accurately, no one can be a Christian who is an Evolutionist.'

"Do you think, really, that this assertion has a very firm foundation? If so, would you be so kind as to be a little more explicit on that point? You must be aware of the evolution and development of the times—you must certainly know, too, that Christianity is fast assimilating itself to the mental development of the times. For example, I myself, as well as a great many others, claim to be Christians, but we do not believe in the 'fall of Adam,' and therefore deny the 'substitutional theory' of the atonement. We also disbelieve the 'six days' creation' in its generally accepted sense, and adopt in its stead the theory of evolution. This phase of Christianity looks on Christ as a reformer—as a moral man, around whom a group of mad enthusiasts hav thrown a veil of obscurity which is but just beginning to fall away from him. If Christian simply means a man who acknowledges human rights and liberty, and a man who in all things tries to do his duty, would you think it so bad a thing?

"Again, in your attacks on Christianity (some of which, I must admit, are well founded), you must concede that you aim at 'Orthodoxy' in all its old-time fulness and inconsistency. Do you not think, to be up to the spirit in which you claim to move, it would be well for you to join hands with, or at least acknowledge, the natural drift and tendency of the new Christianity? Because a name in the past has been one deserving of reproach, is this a reason for still heaping reproach upon it after it has divested itself of that which was reproachful? Not only do we believe in evolution and reject vicarious atonement, but we reject the doctrin of the 'infallibility of the Bible.'

"Of course the remaining fragment, or the remaining body, of orthodoxy, is as yet a formidable barrier to progressiv thought, and will need time to fade away. No great and well-established system or doctrin can be eradicated in a day or week. 'Rome was not built in a day; neither can she be taken in a day.' Yet we hav every reason to believe that the old-time Christianity is fading away, and that at a rapid rate. Now, in conclusion, do you not think that your attacks should hav specified objects? that is, distinctly specified. So long as you aim your endeavors toward the obliteration and extinction of the old theologies, and so long as you attack the existing errors and inconsistencies of orthodoxy in its accepted sense, you are engaged in a laudable work; but you should consider the fact that a large body of respectable, honest people throughout this country call themselvs Christians in view of that name representing the followers of a Christ who taught human rights, love, sympathy, and in all things peace and righteousness among men. You claim, as also do I, to be liberal, ever seeking after truth, and rejecting nothing that is demonstrated to be truth; and in this spirit may all work on for that better future. Yours for the right,

"Poughkeepsie, N. Y. R. D. TOWN."

Our friend wants to know if our remark that an evolutionist is not a Christian has a very firm foundation. We think it has, and will giv our reasons for so thinking.

In the first place, what is Christianity? that is, what are its fundamental postulates?—for it is fairer to our friend in this case to take the general principles than the creed of any one sect? It is, briefly, that only some six thousand years ago the original human parents of the race fell from a state of purity through disobeying a command of an alleged God. This transgression involved all races of men throughout all time. This is the very first and fundamental assumption of Christianity. The next essential step, the tragedy without which Christianity is null and void, an empty and meaningless jargon of phrases, is that, in consequence of this trangression, fallen humanity should be saved by this alleged God offering up a sacrifice of his "only begotten son." These are the two all-important assumptions of Christianity. It makes no difference in this argument whether the idea of the Calvinists be taken, that "God," foreseeing that Adam would fall and that posterity would thereby be damned, therefore selected a few to be saved and called them the elect; or whether it is asserted, with the Augustinian school of theologians, that, while mankind were doomed to hell through Adam's fall, Christ's death canceled all sin and thus saved the race from being utterly lost. The bald facts remain that unless Adam had sinned, the services of an atoner would not hav been needed, and that Christ need not hav come on earth without this early disobedience of the parent of the race. That is the scheme of Christianity as found in the Bible and elaborated by thousands of theological authorities. That no one can be saved except through an acceptance of it, we hav Christ's own words (if there ever was a Christ, and if he ever said anything recorded in the New Testament): "He that believeth not shall be damned."

Secondly, what does evolution teach? It is not necessary to argue the probabilities of evolution, nor to prove its positions and theories, in this brief discussion. The proposition is that an evolutionist can not logically be a Christian. Evolution teaches that the universe came into the form we now see it (so far as we can see it) through a series of changes the immensity of which we can scarcely comprehend. These changes hav occupied enormous periods of time, to which six thousand years are as nothing. Evolution teaches that instead of a pair of first parents, created perfect beings by a fiat of "God," the human race descended from what we call the animal kingdom; that the animal kingdom evolved from the vegetable, and the vegetable from still lower forms of organic life, which life is traced back to protoplasm, "mere specks of albumen floating on the oceans of antiquity." As Beecher says, instead of man falling, he began at zero, and has been ascending ever since. But as our friend is an evolutionist, of course he has studied these theories, and our concern is chiefly to point the impossibility of harmonizing the two systems. Now he believes that man originated as evolution teaches. He must, therefore, disbelieve the plan of creation as related in the Bible. But without the events related in Genesis, there is no need of Christ. It would, in fact, hav been impossible for Christ to hav performed his mission had not Adam by his "sin" created that mission. The teaching of evolution makes the existence of Adam, as the first man, a myth, and consequently by that teaching asserts that the first and major premis of Christianity (Adam's fall) is false. As the affirmation of the Atheist that the universe is all that exists negativs the existence of a "God," so does the affirmations of evolution that man descended from the animal kingdom, and has existed on the earth more than six thousand years, negativ the most essential position of Christianity. No man can believe two diametrically opposit statements. He may think he does—but he does not. However hard our friend might try to believe that London is three thousand miles away, and at the same time that it is also four thousand, he could not deceive even himself. If he compromises (as he is trying to do with Christianity and evolution), and thinks that perhaps it is thirty-five hundred miles, he by this process denies both of the previous statements. To harmonize such conflicting theories as are found in Genesis and in the doctrins of evolution would be a task too stupendous for even S. P. Andrews, the Great Reconciler. If there be any difference whatsoever between things, if ideas are in any way distinct from each other, and if words hav the slightest value in expressing those differences and distinctions, for accuracy's sake let such men as our friend, and millions more like him in this country, straighten out this confused jumble of ideas, and cease mixing speculativ notions with ascertained facts, as well as trying to reconcile what is with what they thought was but is not.

But that is a slight digression, and we return to the point at issue. We hav found that Adam's fall is the major premis in the Christian scheme. Without it all the rest of the structure is a house without a foundation, and not worth living in. With no fulcrum on which to rest his lever, Christ could not lift mankind into heaven. He would simply be like every other man—one in a worldful. We hav seen, too, that a belief in this is essential to being a Christian. We hav also found that evolution denies this alleged fall of Adam. A moment's dwelling on the subject also shows that a person cannot believe two entirely contradictory stories. We think, therefore, that we are fully justified in saying that an evolutionist can not really be a Christian. And were the argument of great names worth a cent, we could cite columns of corroborating opinions of eminent men of both parties. We know the attempt is made by certain "Liberal" Christians to harmonize science and theology, and it was but a Sunday or two ago that a very popular pulpiteer announced that it was only "uninstructed Infidels" who said reconciliation was impossible, but we also know that no amount of metaphysical quibbling, no number of "glittering generalities," can make two and two out to be five. As between such "philosophers," we are like the old man whose son had just returned from college, and was anxious to show off his acquirements. Seated at the dinner table, upon which were two chickens, the boy said, "Father, you would not believe that I can prove there are three chickens on this table, would you?" The father acknowledged his skepticism. "Well," said the youth, pointing to a chicken, "that's one, isn't it?" The old man admitted it. Pointing to the other, the metaphysician said, "That's two." Yes, that made two. "Well," triumphantly exclaimed the boy, "don't one and two make three?" Taking one of the fowls, the abashed father put it on the mother's plate, and transferring the remaining one to his own dish, quietly said, "Well, mother, you eat that one, and I'll eat this, and Dick may hav the third." The Christian evolutionist is the third chicken—he does not exist.

A belief in the Bible used to be a sine qua non of Christianity. Logically, it is so yet. A comparison, therefore, of a few of the differences between the beliefs of Christianity and the facts of evolution may help our friend to see that an evolutionist can never be a true Christian. He may call himself a Christian, but he is not one, and assumes the name at the expense of his love of accuracy, not to say truth.

In early times it was believed that all existing forms of nature were made out of nothing, at the word of a creator, during six days of morning and evening. Evolution teaches that the matter composing the universe has always existed, and that, instead of being creations, all forms of nature are growths, even to the planets that whirl through space. Christianity believes that all forms of life were originally made in their existing form complete. Evolution teaches that all these existing forms of life hav been produced from simpler forms by a gradual process of change. Christianity believes that God placed all animals in just the right place for them to flourish. Evolution teaches that only such animals hav survived as proved themselvs fit, and that in the struggle many species hav become extinct. Christianity believes that all species are permanent. Evolution, on the contrary, shows the variation of species, and how those existing to-day did not always exist. Naturalists and botanists are ever finding new species. Christianity believes that the plants, and fish, and animals are each distinct lives. Evolution has traced the unity of life, and similarity of organs, from the plant up to man. Christianity believes that every animal is suddenly produced in the form of its parent. Evolution tells how each embryo successivly takes on the forms of each species lower than itself in the scale of life. Christianity believes that mind is an entity per se, given to man by God, breathed into him with the breath of life, and that animals hav only "instinct," likewise given them by God. Evolution teaches that mind is the result of organization, that where organization is not, mind does not exist, and that animals' instinct is only less developed mind, because their organization is coarser and less complex. Christianity believes that speech is a faculty suddenly given by God to man, when evolution shows it to be only a developed faculty common to all animals. Christianity believes that morals are only an authoritativ utterance from on high, but evolution says our moral sense is the result of generations of experience. So we might go on for pages contrasting the two, in every phase of science—physical, mental, sociological—all branches. Christianity is an authoritativ, "I said it," and "so mote it be"—a spoken-into-existence thing, like Aladdin's palace—while evolution is a record of growth, of successiv and never-ending changes and variations. There is no sympathy nor harmony between the two, and a believer in one can never accept the other until two objects can occupy the same place at the same time.

Perhaps in considering this subject we may be allowed, as a point in our favor, to note the action of a body of Christians—the friends of our friend. A dispatch from Columbia, S. C., dated Dec. 11, 1884, reports that Dr. Woodrow has been expelled from the Presbyterian Theological Seminary by a vote of the directors of eight to four for teaching evolution. The doctrins of this science, the synods of Georgia and Louisiana hold, are antichristian and Materialistic, and strongly tend toward Infidelity. This opinion of the synods is exactly ours. And we also contend that just so far as a Christian accepts evolution as an explanation of the scientific and philosophical problems ever confronting him, just so far does he cease to be a Christian. And when he accepts the doctrin in its entirety, he ceases to be in any way a Christian for reasons previously pointed out. And we contend, too, that just so fast as Christianity assimilates itself to the mental development of the times, it ceases to be Christianity. It is itself subject to the law of evolution, and cannot resist the trend of the ages. But when it evolutes into a kind, honest, reasonable religion, it will no more be Christianity than the speck of albumen on the ocean of antiquity was the man whose beginning of life it may hav been.

Worshiping Christ as a reformer is about the most absurd thing in the world. What did he reform? He drove the money changers out of the temple in the interests of what? A pure religion, it is claimed. What else did he do. Stole corn in the interests of a pure religion. Anything else? Stole donkeys in the interests of a pure religion. What else? He gave the world the most gigantic and cruel superstition which egotism and fanaticism hav ever conceived. But if we accept him as a reformer, what then? Why, then he was no Christ, and no extraordinary things can be obtained by a belief in him. His alleged divinity and embassadorship from God was his stock-in-trade, and without it any fanatical reformer is as good as he. Mohammed, Joe Smith, or even John Wesley (for Methodism started as a reform within a reform) has as good a claim to be worshiped. As an example of reform, Christ was a failure, as hav been nearly all the alleged saviors of the world. Buddha is about the only one of note among them who did not make worse conditions than he found existing. Christ did not teach "human rights, love, sympathy, and in all things peace and righteousness among men." He taught that poverty of spirit is chief among virtues; that poverty in property is the surest passport to heaven; that the hungry and the grief-stricken are the blessed, and much more stuff utterly foreign to the truth, and in no wise conduciv to the winning of equal human rights. He taught the narrowest of sectarianism, such as, "If any man come unto me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." Instead of peace and righteousness he taught that he came "not to send peace on earth but a sword. For I am come to set man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law, and a man's foe shall be they of his own household." For his sake he told people to forsake relativs and friends, and promised them a reward for so doing of "an hundredfold." Surely Mr. Town cannot be ignorant of all these teachings, yet he thinks Christ taught love, peace, and righteousness! It is evident he reads the scriptures as carelessly as he does the literature of evolution.

Another paragraph, and we must close. "Do you not think," Mr. Town asks, "to be up to the spirit in which you claim to move, it would be well for you to join hands with, or at least acknowledge, the natural drift and tendency of the new Christianity?" If Mr. Town had read THE TRUTH SEEKER often, he would know that we hav recognized, not the new Christianity, but the new reformation in Protestantism, in which the natural drift and tendency is toward Rationalism, and which is sweeping away every vestige of real Christianity, but leaving a hollow shell with no kernel and no vitality. High sounding phrases with no meaning, flowery rhetoric with no substance, soft sawder for God and the rich pewholders, are rapidly taking the place of the stern theology of the past. So far as the cruelty of Christianity is repudiated, so far as superstition is dethroned, so far as myth and fable are laughed down the aisles, we heartily join hands with the new reformers. But what we want to see, what we are laboring to bring about, is the total abolition of a supernatural religion, and the substitution of a rational philosophy that shall concern itself with the here and now, with making the earth a more habitable place, and the men and women who dwell on it happier beings. This can never, we are convinced, be brought about by half-hearted efforts. The quicker men see that the idol to which they hav so long been bound is nothing but a creation of human brains, that the whole Christian fabric is a gilt-edged fraud, the quicker will they apply themselvs to the herculean task of righting human wrongs and relieving human misery. It is easier to build on ground free from rubbish than it is when the cornerstones must be laid amid weeds and briers, or on a quicksand which falls away at a touch. That is why we oppose Christianity with might and main. Though the church oft shifts her ground, she is at heart the same enslaver of minds. In the complete extinction of supernaturalism is man's only sure safety.

Censorship in Art.

Brute Comstock's most recent case is drawing from religious and semi-religious papers long editorials on the necessity of a censorship of the press and pallet. Among the items enumerated as demanding a supervision are the photographs sold on the streets, the show-bills of theaters, illustrated weekly journals, and story papers for the youths and shop girls of the city. "We will not say," says one paper, "that the world belongs to the saints, and that they hav a commission to rule it. But we respond to as much of that opinion as is involved in the proposition that the moralities and decencies are sovereign things, and that, in their name, and by their authority, decent people ought to insist on ruling society."

Precisely. Morality and decency are sovereign things—there is no kind of question about that. But, pray tell us, ye saintly hypocrits who urge the Bible on the people, who shall construe the two things? All things are said to be relativ, and "indecency" is, therefore, like blasphemy, a question of geography. And, further, it is a question of taste. Still further, no two persons' tastes are alike. For instance: the nude pictures adorning the gallery walls of the Vanderbilt and Stewart mansions; those which were exhibited at the Philadelphia Exhibition; others on every artist's easel, and in almost every home of wealth in all the cities of the country, are, in the opinion of some, in questionable taste. In literature, too, one book, which is hawked and peddled about everywhere; which is translated into scores of languages, and given away by thousands of missionaries at an expense of millions of dollars, is, in large part, a beastly production of the printing-press. Yet every one would consider it an outrage to deprive the people of these things, and any government which should attempt it would be quickly overturned.

But shall wealthy people hav what best pleases them, and the poorer people be deprived of such enjoyments? Shall the artist who sold Vanderbilt a thousand-dollar painting of a modern Eve be protected, and the poor vendor of a photograph ten times more decent (in so far as clothes make decency) be prosecuted? So the "saints" seem to think.

The practical working of this censorship would be intolerable. New York city has one now in the person of Comstock, backed by the wealth and political power of a few men. In the "suppression" of literature his exploits are well known. He prosecutes the publishers of journals inimical to his church, classical works which are the models of scholars, and suffers a wealthy Bible Society and a powerful political sport to circulate indecency without hindrance. In art his efforts are equally one-sided. The greatest work of one of Europe's greatest artists is by him ordered from a shop window, while he permits, in public academies, canvas glowing with precisely the same sort of beauty. There is no more justice in this than there is sense in having such a censorship at all.

That scoundrels hav made books unfit for human eye to see is true. But society has also made laws to punish them, and pays officers to enforce these laws. A public officer not performing his sworn duty is liable to impeachment. Private societies for the prosecution of criminals always conduce to tyranny and monstrous injustice. They speedily degenerate into weapons for the satisfying of private grudges. All of the ecclesiastical societies of this city are instances. Especially is this true of Comstock's society, and his latest case is a glaring exhibition of official power prostituted to personal spite. The poor victim is the man who once, while being dragged to prison, assaulted with a penknife the unscrupulous agent. Since that time Comstock has pursued him relentlessly, and the present arrest is plainly the merest pretext in the world. The photograph is much less "indecent" than thousands exposed by all the leading dealers in the city, which can be seen by any one walking Broadway from the City Hall to the Park. Dozens of artists, photographers, reporters, and lawyers examined it last week in the court room, and not one could see in it any violation of decency. It has been shown to the most fastidious ladies, who failed to find in it a solitary reason for imprisoning the seller. Yet the agent demands that Conroy be sent to prison for exposing it for sale. Leaving aside for a moment the religion, the poverty of the vendor, the fact that he is a cripple unable to perform manual labor, admitting, if need be for the sake of the argument, that a censorship of art is desirable, there is nothing in the picture which calls for its special condemnation over similar works. The arrest is purely a gratification of the spite which Comstock holds against Conroy. We would not say the spite is aggravated by the fact that Conroy is a Catholic while Comstock is a bigoted Protestant, for the assault committed years ago is as far as it is necessary to seek for the motiv. But we do hold that this case is one of the strongest possible reasons why a censorship of art is impossible in a democratic country in which the poorest and weakest is supposed to be protected in his rights as fully as the richest and most powerful. And we are glad to know that the victim of Comstock's animosity is not to be ruthlessly offered up without a vigorous protest by the leading artists of the city.

The Churches of Washington Territory Must Pay Taxes.

WALLA WALLA, WASH. TER., Dec. 5, 284.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: At our late general election the matter of taxing church property was submitted to the popular vote, which resulted in a very decided majority in favor of such taxation. Score one for Freethought. I will send you the official vote as soon as I can procure it.

Yours for truth, W. S. GILLIAM.

P.S.—As you are perhaps aware, our laws hav for several years past taxed church property. Through church influence an act was passed by our last legislature submitting the question of taxing church property to a popular vote of the territory, with the above result. We hope, after such a defeat, that they will be satisfied for a season. W. S. G.

THE recent death of Mr. Justice Watkins Williams in a house of ill-fame while on circuit in Nottingham, recalls the fact that he was one of the most brutal denouncers of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant. He was extraordinarily pious. His death has created a profound sensation in England. The greatest efforts were made to hush the unsavory affair up. The coroner received an intimation from "a very high quarter" that his duty only required him to inquire into the cause of death, and not into the attendant circumstances. This, however, only served to make him more minute in his researches into every detail of the untoward catastrophe. This stand he maintained, despite the protest of the jury, who on three separate occasions declared themselvs fully satisfied with the facts already placed before them. The coroner, however, insisted on going into the case just as he would, he asserted, into that of "a common sweep or stocking maker." The daily press of London did not apparently share in the coroner's belief in the merits of publicity, as they each and all, whilst recording the judge's death, suppressed the attendant circumstances. That default has, however, been rectified to the full by the issue of a complete resume of the revolting details in pamphlet form. This has been hawked at every street corner in London during the last month, the cries of the vendors and the huge posters which they carry having aroused an immense demand for the prurient brochure.

THE Christians of Melbourne, Australia, are endeavoring, like God, to devise a device against their enemies the Freethinkers. They seem determined to close the Hall of Science and prevent the publication of Joseph Symes's Liberator. Their plan is to force the government to prosecute, and if the present laws are not sufficient for the purpose, to get Parliament to enact new ones. The Sydney police hav seized and destroyed a lot of "Fruits of Philosophy," and the "Elements of Social Science." Both books circulate in England without restraint since the Bradlaugh and Besant trial, as they also do in this country.

As will be seen by an advertisment in another place, we hav received a supply of the "Agnostic Annual." Orders for it accompanied by 25 cents promptly filled. THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC will be ready shortly.

Letters from Friends.

EUREKA, CAL., Nov. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read Mr. Putnam's letter to Mr. Chainey, and I indorse every word of it. It shows a true appreciation of the case, and cool, sound judgment. I am sorry for Mr. Chainey. He is exactly what Mr. Watts describes him to be—a man highly cultured, highly gifted, well meaning, with strong emotions, but without reason or judgment. I am glad that Mr. Watts refuses to accept Mr. Chainey's challenge. Not that I think Mr. Watts would not be equal to the task; on the contrary, I am confident Mr. Watts could annihilate Mr. Chainey in debate, even on even ground; but in this case the ground on which Mr. Chainey stands is worse than no ground at all, since it is of such a nature as to prevent him from making a defense. Yet a debate between Mr. Watts and Mr. Chainey would cause a good deal of ill-feeling between Materialists and Spiritualists, an event which for the sake of the prosperity of both parties ought to be avoided. I pity Mr. Chainey. He finds himself thrown into a world in which he is unfit to liv. He is ideal, aerial, and emotional, while the world around him is cool, calculating, and practical. His mind takes fancy flights far above the clouds, and would remain there if physical wants did not remind him, to his disgust, that he belongs to this earth. He is like a well-dressed doll in the hands of children—loved and admired, but of no practical value. Mr. Chainey did not comprehend Mr. Putnam's meaning when the latter told him that he acted exactly like Moody, and took the part of a converted Christian. This fact shows that Mr. Chainey's mind has no clear, practical turn. He, unlike the butterfly who goes from flower to flower to extract the honey, flies from ism to ism to extract ideas, which his unpractical mind converts into gall. I cannot see what could hav caused that unprovoked attack upon Materialism by Mr. Chainey unless it was that he had absorbed more gall from that ism than he could digest, and was forced to vomit some.

If Mr. Chainey was a true Liberal he would not declaim against any ism. He would know that our ideas and beliefs are not made to order for us, but that they force themselvs upon us independent of our volition. Why, then, should one person or sect denounce another person or sect when all of us are forced to believe according to the evidence we hav before us, and we cannot help ourselvs?

On the whole, I think Mr. Chainey would not be so anxious to debate if he had any idea that Mr. Watts would accept the challenge, for, let him be ever so egotistic, he must feel his inferiority, aside from the fact that he has no ground to stand upon.

I am glad that Mr. Watts has come among us. While in oratorical talent the great Ingersoll is ahead of him, in sound sense and judgment he has no superior, in my opinion.

I hav read with profit and satisfaction the articles of Herbert Spencer in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the ideas of his critics are to me as clear as mud.

Inclosed you will find $5, my mite toward defraying the expenses of our missionaries, Messrs. Watts and Putnam. I hope their labors may be crowned with success. They hav a great advantage over the Christian missionaries. The world has arrived at a stage where everybody is more or less inclined to think, yet the Christian missionary tells his proselytes, "If you think, you will be damned," while our missionaries will tell their proselytes that they will be damned if they don't think.

"Bible Morals," by John E. Remsburg, ought to be printed in pamphlet form. To one like me, who is alwsys ready for an argument in regard to Bible morals, without having the time to turn that pile of rubbish over, it would be of great value. I intended to cut it out of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but my usual luck, somebody carried off the paper containing the first part. If you hav a copy of that number left, please send it to me. ROBERT GUNTHER.

[Brother Gunther will find by referring to our advertising columns that his desire has been anticipated, and that "Bible Morals" is published in a substantial pamphlet.—ED. T. S.]

THE CURSE OF THE GOD IDEA.

LACROSSE, WIS., Dec. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The God idea has produced the most extravagant speculation, the most visionary fraud, the most ignorant ideas, and most unnatural chimeras ever foisted on an undiscerning and credulous world. It has by its frightful phantoms forced the mind to vegetate in primitiv stupidity, entangled man's reason in a labyrinth, from which he cannot extricate himself; it has subjugated the many for the benefit of the few; it has manacled the limbs and torporized the mind. The God idea has robbed man of every noble thought, feeling, impulse, and made him the prey of the most savage passions, while the supposed deity is described as exulting with fiendish delight over the horrid desolation. If Christians want proofs, let them turn to the Bible; its pages will furnish to reflectiv minds an illustration of the fruits of God's worship. They will find there the bloodiest rites, the most incestuous orgies, sensual ceremonies, obscene representations, scandalous prostitutions, gorging feasts, vindictiv murders, heartrending immolations, and every curse and crime in the calendar of human depravity, as the actions of the peculiar favorits of a god, and that god is the God of the Christians.

All tyrannies are based upon the God idea. Nothing but the fear of an infinitly powerful and vindictiv being would induce men to submit to the countless villainies practiced upon them by their fellow-mortals, called priests, who hav treacherously infused the idea that they are of a superior order, born to power and wealth. Man has become a mere machine in the hands of the political and theological tyrants who hav treated him as a slave; he has contracted the vices of one. The God idea ever was, and ever will be, the cause and curse of man's depravity, of his social and political inequality, continually teaching and instilling into him forbearance under the most atrocious oppressions, from the expectations of being rewarded hereafter.

The God idea, wherever existing, has produced similar effects. The Jupiter and Neptune of the Greeks, the Brahma and Vishnu of the Hindoos, the Osiris and Typhon of the Egyptians, the Mithras and Ormuzd of the Persians, or the Jehovah and Satan of the Jews and Christians, hav alike crushed man's intellect, warped his judgment, and made the earth a perfect hell. Men of America, how much longer will you suffer such contemptible mummery to curse and enslave you? Mankind are a long-enduring race, or the whole owlish sky-pilots fattening on the Jew God and his whole heavenly hosts would long ere this hav been swept from the earth by the fury and scorn of an oppressed people. But I hope it is not too late. Let the people inquire into everything, diffuse what is true, overthrow what is false. It is high time for men to think for themselvs, for they hav been duped and plundered long enough by priestly, legal, titled, and moneyed rulers, who, by the staff, the Jew Bible, and the bayonet manage to get them down, and when down to keep them down. Let the religious and political swindlers be once exposed, and then honest producers will get their own, and in order to do this honest people must make good sense catching, then there will be no occasion for men to rail at churches and priests. But the way things are, the working slaves are the fools who invite the knaves to blindfold them, whilst they pick their pockets. Hav the intelligence and good sense to destroy the cause, and the effect will cease.

I am the well-wisher of the whole human race,

J. PETTEY.

FLAGSTAFF, ARIZONA, Dec. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: After a long silence, I will again try to contribute my mite for your worthy readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a regular and ever-welcome visitor in my house. In fact, I cannot do without it. I enjoy reading the letters from Liberals in other and more favored portions of the land, and perhaps they would like to hear something from a Freethinker away out here in this isolated country, where, until recently, the dread Apache and the border ruffians held supreme control. When the red devils were not on the warpath, the cowboy element kept the country terrorized, for it is a well-known fact that here in our territory there hav been as bold a lot of riders as ever swung a rietta on the border. But now a new order of things has taken place. Two of the great trans-continental railways, the Atlantic and Pacific and the Southern Pacific, traverse this territory from east to west. These are, indeed, the great civilizers.

Ours is a lumbering village on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, where are situated the immense mills of the Ayer Lumber Company of Chicago. Here we hav one of the finest grazing countries, and as beautiful a climate as there is on the face of the earth. Here, too, Freethought can hav full sway, and we that love nature can worship at her shrine to our hearts' content.

We are not over-troubled here with sky-pilots, and Methodist circuses, there being but one embassador of the meek and lowly in this part of the country, and fortunately he attends pretty strictly to his own affairs, and would be, withal, a pretty good fellow, if he was only on the other track.

I take the only TRUTH SEEKER that comes to this place, and I take great pride in loaning numbers wherever I can where I think they will be read. Then I get them again, and loan them again and again, until they are worn out. I also hav Ingersoll's "Gems of Thought," and his "Christian Religion," and they, too, are loaned out all the time. I am proud to say that they are doing good work. In my quiet way, I do all I can to advance the cause of Freethought. I work untiringly in the noble and glorious cause which I hav espoused, striving to let my light so shine that I may be an honor, and not a disgrace, to the cause of mental freedom for which we are fighting.

I am the only open and avowed Infidel in this place. Only a short time ago, a young man said to me, "And you are an Infidel, are you?" "Yes, sir, I am proud to be one of the grand army of progress." "Well," said he, "I don't like to talk to a man who does not believe in a God." "But," said I "does Webster say an Infidel denies the existence of a supreme being? I say not." And I gave him Webster's definition of "Infidel," which rather opened his eyes, after which we had a long, pleasant chat. And now he stops me and asks me to talk with him upon the subject of Freethought, and wants to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and my Liberal books.

Now, brother-Liberals, if we expect to succeed in this great reformation that has been so nobly begun, we must work—work early and late. Let our daily walk be such that it will cast no reproach upon us, as a class. The world looks on in amazement. And the church, once all-powerful, stands aghast and with wonder watches the rapid progress that Liberalism is making. Keep the ball rolling. A wave of light is passing all over the world, and we are becoming more civilized.

Only a few years ago, in my boyhood days, it was almost impossible to get hold of a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason." Now it can be had almost anywhere. The great and glorious words he wrote hav come ringing down the aisles of time for more than a century, and it will be the same with the writings of Col. Ingersoll, D. M. Bennett, Col. Kelso, and others that hav done so much for us. Their works will be treasured and read by the millions yet unborn.

I hope to liv to help elect a Liberal president of the United States—some noble, whole-souled Freethought worker like Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. It is not beyond our reach. It will be but a few years more, at the rate Liberalism is progressing, until we can put our own candidate into the field, and, too, with hopes of success. I want to liv to see all property equally taxed all over our union—every dollar's worth of church property taxed at its full value. In California, where I spent twenty years of the best of my life, church property is taxed, showing unmistakably how Liberal the people are. And I believe it is the only state in the union where church property is taxed. New York not only exempts all church property from taxation, but allows each minister of the gospel of superstition $1,500 worth of property or money free from taxation. And there are those hundreds of drones, or hangers-on, as it were, living off the labor of the hard-working and honest people. What a shame! 'Tis a stain upon any state government. Now, brothers, let us throw the mantle of protection around the Liberal lecturers that are in the field—Watts, Putnam, Reynolds, and others. The noble pioneers, they are doing a great work, of which the coming millions will be proud. Only think for a moment what has already been accomplished. I can remember a few years back, when, had I expressed myself as I do now, every day, I would hav been imprisoned; and only a few years back of that I would hav been burnt at the stake for blasphemy. But, thanks to the Infidels of '76, who, by keeping God out of the Constitution and inserting instead, "We, the people," did us a lasting good, a good for which we cannot be too grateful.

I find in every community in which I hav lived many Liberals who, for policy's sake, keep quiet, and would not acknowledge themselvs Liberals for fear of being called Infidels. Many hav said to me, "How dare you be so outspoken? Doesn't it hurt you in your business?" I answer, "It would hurt me worse to be a hypocrit." I was reared by very strict orthodox Methodist parents, and what education I got was in a Methodist college. Every means was resorted to to get Methodism into me, but they utterly failed. In this way I lost several years of my mental liberty. But I tell you, now, brothers, I am making up for lost time. I am the open enemy of Christology and superstition. I denounce the old Jew book of myths, mystery, and Mormonism when and wherever opportunity presents itself. It is a mass of obscene literature for which I hav very little use. It is my candid opinion that very few really intelligent people of to-day believe in the divine origin of the Bible, and science entirely upsets the theory of the divinity of Christ, immaculate conception being contrary to the unalterable laws of nature. And as to the great plan of salvation, it shows fraud upon the face of it. If God foreknew all things before the foundation of the world, how was it that it took him four thousand years to work out this plan of salvation? Quien sabe? But I fear I hav strung this letter out too long already, so for this time, with a Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will bid you adieu.

J. C. BURGE.

WENTWORTH, DAK., Dec. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I must ask your kind indulgence again for a short time. I wish to relate to you a story with a result. Friend Jamieson has been here and given us another rousing old course of lectures, consisting of five, to well-filled houses. It is estimated that at the last lecture Sunday evening there were from 175 to 200 listeners, which for this sparsely-settled country is a good showing. The poor follower of Christ feels lonely in this burg just now, I can tell you, as one lady said after the close of the last lecture, which, by the way, was, "Has Jesus Christ any Followers on Earth at the Present Time?" Well, that lecture has completely knocked the foundation out under my religion. It is a fact that the professor actually struck terror to the hearts of some by the clear-cut sentences, the preacher-proof arguments, and the bed-rock reasonings as he showed up the true cussedness of some of Christ's chosen. I tried my level best to get some of the keepers of flocks of the meek and lowly Jesus to come and cross swords with the professor, but not one could I find. I went seventeen miles to try and find a man to stand up for the cause of Christ, but no, sir, they dare not come to the front and defend their case. I hav come to the conclusion that they are a bigger set of cowards than were some of the child-butchers of old. But we stand on our feet at last. Sunday evening before the lecture we made a call for names for a Liberal League, and sooner than it takes me to write it we had thirty-six, and about twenty-five more that were not out will join, making a membership of about sixty. The matters pertaining to the cause of Liberalism were discussed some, after which the officers of the League for the ensuing year were elected, as follows: President, W. L. Horton; vice-president, I. R. Zimmermann; secretary, R. Claudet; corresponding secretary, R. R. Wentworth; treasurer, Chas. Kochne. Saturday, Dec. 13th, was set for our first meeting, to take steps to regularly organize and take such other steps as we thought best. We shall probably unite at once with the National Liberal League. We hav named ours the "Banner League."

Allow me one more word, and then I am done. Brother Jamieson, we thank you for your labors in our behalf, and we sincerely hope that the small shoot you hav planted here will soon grow to be a mighty oak. And we think with the excellent home talent we hav we are bound to succeed. Again I say, we thank you.

Yours for truth and justice, not for Christ's sake, but for humanity's sake, W. L. HORTON.

LYON, KAN., Dec. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: After reading Mr. Frederic Harrison's paper in THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning "Agnostic Metaphysics," I will confess, with a sense of humility, that it has left nothing definit in my mind concerning the Knowable which he would place as a basis of religion in the place of the Unknowable, the Eternal Energy, of Mr. Herbert Spencer. The first part of Mr. Harrison's essay is a mixture of wit and wisdom directed with skill and zeal against the Unknowable as a basis of religion; the second part is, I believe, a good definition of the Positiv Philosophy of Auguste Comte.

Mr. Harrison cannot see the possibility of building a religion upon something inscrutable and unknowable, and he insists that it must rest "upon something that can be known and conceived of." If he would tell us what can be known and conceived apart from physical nature, and from a base of religion, and also giv us his definition of the word "religion," we could compare his Knowable basis to the Unknowable of Mr. Spencer, and see which is the more solid of the two.

I believe what Mr. Spencer means by the Unknowable is that men cannot giv it form, although they may recognize its force at every step, and also feel it through their sensitiv organizations. No one can demonstrate that it is black, white, short, long, solid, or liquid, man, woman, or elephant. It is like electricity—although we can see the effects which it produces, we cannot giv form to the energy which produces them. We can see the apples fall to the ground, but who will be able to giv a picture to our consciousness of what gravitation looks like? After deducting the effects which belong to the realm of our consciousness, gravitation and electricity remain unknowable to our consciousness.

It seems immaterial to me whether the Unknowabl e is called the primary substratum, the Eternal Energy, or God, or even if we call it a property belonging to matter. We are forbidden by our finite consciousness to describe the Infinit Eternal Energy, and we might just as well shut the door to our curiosity in that line and draw the latch in.

Mr. Harrison may be correct when he says that Mr. Spencer stands nearly alone with his religion of the Unknowable, if by "religion" he means the building of rites, the teaching of rules of conduct, and the chanting of praises to the Unknowable Eternal Energy. But people who believe in that Energy, and who hav seen the childishness of giving form to it, can be counted by the thousands. JOSEPH LE CLERC.

ST. CATHARINE'S, ONT., Dec. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please accept the pittance I send you this time and use fifty cents of it for a copy of the Bennett monument and copy of J. E. Remsberg's valuable missionary pamphlet, "Bible Morals," with it if you can afford it; and apply the balance on my subscription.

I presume your excitement of the election has nearly or quite cooled off by this time. I think it unfortunate for your country and its business that your presidential elections occur so often, for it frustrates all kinds of business for a time, and is more or less injurious to the morals of your people.

Having once on a time been directly interested in your elections, it has often occurred to me that your presidential term is too short, that if it was extended to six years it would be an improvement, and to confine each president-elect to that time and no more would be another improvement, and thus do away with the second and third terms which now and again are the cause of much discussion. As to parties, I think it quite desirable that there should be two, one to watch the other, and quite as desirable that neither party should be in power more than two terms, were it possible to arrange it thus; for one party, whatever its name or pretensions to honesty in the welfare of the country, will become more or less corrupt if its term of office is unduly prolonged. The opportunities for speculation are numerous and tempting, and few there are who can withstand them. Notwithstanding, each party make every exertion to convince the citizens of the country that they are perfect in their principles, yet I don't apprehend that there is any essential difference in their fundamental principles. Their political differences are more in name than in reality, and hav no particular effect one way or the other in the various manipulations of the government.

A few weeks since in preparing some matter for the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which proves to be interesting to both young and old, the thought flashed upon me that Miss Wixon's duties in that department as editor might be rather arduous when compared with the remuneration she may receive, judging from what is realized for labor in other departments of our cause. Now, I would propose that every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER prepare some matter appropriate for that department, either original or selected, and send it to her now and again, and thereby keep her supplied. It would require but a slight amount of time from each one to fulfil the adage that every little helps. Write it down, dear friends, in some conspicuous place that you may not forget to do so.

In conclusion, I will relate a farcial matter which was produced by an attempt to make a witness of a boy about five years of age in one of our courts a few weeks since. In order to fulfil the law requiring an oath in giving testimony, which is yet in vogue here, the judge turned to the boy and asked him if he knew what an oath was? "No, sir," he said. "Did you ever attend a Sunday-school?" "Yes, sir." "How long hav you attended a Sunday-school?" "I don't know." "Who sent you to Sunday-school?" "My mother." "What did your teacher teach you?" "I don't know." "Did she teach you to be a good boy, and always tell the truth? that it was wicked to lie, and that if you did lie you would go to a bad place and be punished for it?" "Yes, sir." "Then you wouldn't tell a lie if you knew it?" "No, sir." "But you don't know what an oath is?" "No, sir." The judge then shook his head. The lawyer then questioned the boy and asked him if he knew what the Bible was, holding one up to him. He said, "No, sir." "Did you ever read the Bible?" "No, sir." "Did any one ever read it to you?" "No, sir." "Did your teacher tell you about heaven?" "Yes, sir." "Did she tell about God?" "Yes, sir." "Do you know who God is?" "No, sir." Such presumption! to ask a child a question that he could not answer himself, I'll be bound to say. The court refused his evidence. Thus ended the farce with the boy. When will mankind cease to be dupes? C. B. THOMPSON.

GOLDSBERRY, MO., Nov. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I ordered from your house a few weeks ago the "Faraday Pamphlets," hoping to find in them (judging from the titles) something upon which to found a belief in spirit existence. I hav but recently lost a darling child. Oh! how hard to giv the greatest joy of my life to the cold and unresponsiv tomb! I am searching for grounds upon which to base a hope and belief in immortality. But what a mockery to one in earnest are the "Faraday Pamphlets."

And now, Mr. Editor, I wish to ask you if any of the leading thinkers, philosophers, and scientists of to-day are avowed advocates or believers in Spiritualism? Is it not, after all, a gross superstition? The old "Endor" and "Salem" witchcraft in modern dress?

In conclusion, I wish to say a word in regard to politics. I do not believe THE TRUTH SEEKER can be made a political organ without endangering its success. While I believe in free thought and free speech, I do not believe in abusing one's privileges. Already one or two communications hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER which, if I knew were indorsed by the editor, I should refuse to read it any longer. Going back to Spiritualism, I do not say any hard things of its advocates; I only fear that there is nothing in it. It looks too much like the practice of the "Black Art."

Hoping to see Liberalism and Freethought grow, spread, and sweep this country in the near future, I remain truly one of the earnest advocates thereof. P. J. BURTON.

[THE TRUTH SEEKER is a free paper so far as the expression of opinion is concerned. With about two-thirds of the communications the editor disagrees, but that is no reason why the opinions should not be printed. And it would hardly be Liberal for Mr. Burton to stop his paper because he finds opinions in it contrary to his own. Perhaps his views would be as distateful to others. Bear and forbear, is a charitable way.—ED. T. S.]

CHESTER, PA., Dec. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please credit $1 to my subscription. I am in receipt of a letter from Charles B. Reynolds in reference to a course of lectures in this place. I hav done my best to get a hall, but it is next to impossible, as there are but two halls here, and they are owned or controled by Christians, who positivly refuse to rent them for Liberal lectures. At one time I offered to bear the largest portion of the expense of getting R. G. Ingersoll here myself, and some friends got together and tried our best to get a hall, but we were refused.

I hav also tried to raise a League here. There are plenty of Liberals, but only a few who are bold enough to speak their honest thoughts, but I do not see why they need be afraid as long as they act honestly in their business transactions. I am generally known as an unbeliever in the holy scripture (so-called), but I do a pretty good business. I deal "fair, square, and honest," with all whom I hav dealings with, and that accounts for it. Christians, like all others, will go where they can get the most and the best for their money, and I would say to my Liberal friends to deal honestly in all their business transactions, and they need not be afraid of Christian persecution. Christians will and do like to deal with honest people, regardless of belief. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER success, I am, Yours for universal mental liberty, EDW. DICKERSON.

NEWPORT, ME., Dec. 6, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: It is a little over a quarter of a century since the first and only Free Convention ever held in this country took place; is it not time to call another? In 1857—I think it was—a Free Convention was held in Rutland, Vermont. It was not an Infidel, or a Spiritualist, or a Christian convention, but "A Free Convention," and the only one ever held on this continent on a correct principle.

To call a meeting or convention, and agree beforehand what to talk about, is false in principle. I, therefore, move that a Free Convention be held, commencing on the fourth of July next, in Princeton, Mass., to continue as long as may seem needful at the time. And I furthermore suggest that said convention shall not be governed by an arbitrary despot called a "president," but that each speaker be his or her own president. Those who hav outgrown childhood need no pope, king, or president to govern them, but are a law unto themselvs. Another important matter. Let no one in particular be invited to attend, for all truly redeemed souls, men and women, will be present without invitation. Also let there be no paid speakers, for truth is free without money or price.

Editors of papers whose souls are imbuded with a deep love for humanity will print the above. SEWARD MITCHELL.

P.S.—We are having a grand time by a visit from a dear little fourteen-year-old Infidel—Clara Louisa Lewis, of Bangor, Me., daughter of William and Julia Lewis, and niece of Albert Lewis and wife, all Infidels, and, of course, subscribers to the ever grand TRUTH SEEKER. She is the little—in stature, but not in soul—philanthropist who has collected money for our friend J. Hacker, and a correspondent of Mrs. Slenker. The good father and mother of Clara will never allow a traitorous Christian priest to poison her young mind with their blasphemous lies. A diviner soul I never met than Clara Louisa Lewis. S. M.

ALEXANDRIA, ONT., Nov. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, out of it pay for my TRUTH SEEKER for 1885, and the balance please apply to the Campaign Fund. This campaign is not likely to ever do me any personal good, as circumstances hav placed me, and are likely to retain me, where I never will again hav the pleasure of hearing the rational discourses of those lecturers, or in any way derive any benefit from the good they are doing, as I liv in a community that never has and never will be less than a hundred years behind the civilization of any given period; nevertheless it does me good to do what little I can to help a good cause, and I am only sorry that I cannot do more. Six years ago I got strapped the worst way. Now I am doing well enough, but cannot do very much for the public, owing to an accident that befell my aged father. Five years ago, through some crooks of our Christian laws, and by the rapacity of a Christian notary, he lost an annual rent which was his only means of subsistence the rest of his life, and shortly after his house burnt up with everything in it, leaving the old couple, father and step-mother, entirely destitute, and both of them about eighty years of age. This explains why I am not giving more to help carry on the good work of civilizing the people, but my disposition is there, and my mite I shall offer as long as I liv, to help spread the gospel of humanity. I visited my father a month ago. While there, a neighbor of my age, and a schoolmate of mine, called on me in the evening. He had heard years ago that I was a Freemason, and still worse, subsequently, an Infidel. He gave me a long sermon which he ended in tears, as he said he could not bear the thought of so good a friend as I going to the awful hell which he had described, for eternity. I did not attempt to reply to his foolish but candid speech. It was too evident that diamonds would not there be appreciated, and were liable to choke the gray-headed baby, so I only made a short retort as follows: "Friend Israel, you are very kind, but your chagrin has no real cause; there is not fire enough in hell to light your pipe with," as he was searching his pockets for a match. I had at least the pleasure of seeing my reply take a happy effect on my poor old father. The hearty laugh he enjoyed over it was a plain indication that he more than half believed it to be correct, and my friend left the house promising to pray for me, but from the jocose way in which he said it I believe he was feeling a little ashamed of his tears.

Yours as ever, and for ever, I hope, CHAS. LAPERCHE.

LOCUST BAYOU, ARK., Dec. 1, 284.

MR. EDITOR: By some means our friend, D. M. Bennett, got my address, and sent me the first number of his paper from Illinois, and I forwarded him the amount, and hav been a subscriber since. You will find inclosed a post-office order for five dollars for the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER, and please hand over the balance to our friend Courtlandt Palmer, treasurer of the National Liberal League, and I shall endeavor to do more. Well, Friend Eugene, please excuse me, but you would never know, did not I tell you, that that inestimable lady, Fanny Wright, remained in my father's house some ten days when in Baltimore; she delivered a course of lectures; that was in 1829, and they talked of mobbing her. The house was thronged with visitors while she remained. It was after that Robert Dale Owen and she published the Free Inquirer in your city. One morning she came in the sitting-room and said, "Mr. Haslam, I must tell you what a compliment Thomas Jefferson paid me. One day he came in the library, and said, 'I hav a small work in my library, but I prize it above any work in my house.' I asked him if I could get one? How could I procure it? what was the title? Then he said 'It's "A Few Days in Athens."'" In that day it was said she was one of the most intellectual women that ever lived.

Fraternally yours, JOHN H. HASLAM.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Dec. 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper devotes one or two pages weekly to "Letters from Friends," and judging from the total neglect or indifference to articles which I hav sent to your office, I am inclined to think I cannot be so regarded. Whether such indifference is intentional or not is best known to yourself. But, I would inquire, are my principles, as a Materialist, distasteful to your publication and objectionable to your readers? If so, the sooner I know the truth the better. I hav no vanity or ambition to serve by seeing my name or my articles in print. I hav but one motiv, which I firmly believe to be sound and good, and that is the strongest opposition to, or extinction of, all supernatural and dogmatic superstitions, and I hesitate not to include that insidious system known by the name of modern Spiritualism, which stands on a par with all other systems of religious deceits. I claim that Materialism is founded on natural law, and no kind of religion is so founded. Reason alone is the guide of the Materialist. But religion ever begins when reason is impaired or extinct.

Sir, yours fraternally, THOS. WINTER, Materialist.

CLEOPATRA, MO., Dec. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just at present to ask you to not let my paper stop, as that would leave us a family almost entirely alone. Inclosed find $1.50. Send us 50 cents' worth of the Iron Clad series. Select such as you think most suitable to hand to such folks as will look at what they call an Infidel, as though they were trying to decide in their own mind that he is surely crazy. I am satisfied that if Mr. Watts, Mr. Putnam, Col. Ingersoll, or any of our live talkers would come this way these slaves to tradition would swarm out and pay their money, too, for I hear them speak of these men in a way as much as to say, "We hav got to take a good look to find out if they are really men." J. W. DAY.

DIGHTON, MICH., Dec. 1, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I write to inform you of the death of Geo. Nelson Marvin, Nov. 27, 284, aged 22 years. George N. Marvin has been an exemplary young man and a good Liberal; he died without a fear of death. His mother was an Adventist and she kept trying to convert him until he would not talk to her any more. He knew he was dying about three hours before his death, but still he was calm, and died as he had lived, a noble man. He did not wish any sermon over his remains, but his mother had a preacher to speak over him.

Yours in universal mental liberty, MISS MARTHA ROOT.

HUDSON, WIS., Dec. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the petition with fifteen names, —not all from this town, though, as I hav four subscriptions from Moorhead, Minn. I hav introduced THE TRUTH SEEKER to some friends in Moorhead, and you will probably hav a subscriber from that place. In this town it is very hard to work for THE TRUTH SEEKER, for most every individual is a slave to priestcraft (here are about seven churches and no less than twenty saloons), and my Scandinavian countrymen, like myself, are not all able masters of the English language.

Yours for universal mental liberty, CHAS. HANSON.

TOLEDO, OHIO, Dec. 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I see a good deal of commentary pro and con on the "Georgia Wonder." Now, what I wish to say is this, that she is a fraud, and I will take pleasure in explaining every trick she does to any of our Liberal friends that wish a practical explanation. If such a fraud can be imposed upon the people at this late day, how easy it must hav been for that man Jesus to hav played his miracle game 1,884 years ago! Address me at Cleveland, Ohio. Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Simple Tale, in Two Acts.

ACT FIRST.

Dear grandmamma, I write to say
(And you'll be glad, I know,)
That I am coming, Saturday,
To spend a week or so.

I'm coming, too, without mamma;
You know I'm eight years old!
And you will see how good I'll be,
To do as I am told!

I'll help you lots about you work—
There's so much I can do—
I'll weed the garden, hunt for eggs,
And feed the chickens, too.

And maybe I will be so good
You'll keep me there till fall;
Or, better still, perhaps you'll say,
I can't go home at all!

Now, grandmamma, please don't forget
To meet me at the train!
For I'll be sure to come—unless
It should cloud up and rain.

ACT SECOND.

Dear mamma, please put on your things,
And take the next express;
I want to go back home again—
I'm very sick, I guess!

My grandma's very good to me,
But grandma isn't you;
And I forgot, when I came here,
I'd got to sleep here, too!

Last night I cried myself to sleep,
I wanted you so bad!
To-day I cannot play or eat,
I feel so very sad.

Please mamma, come, for I don't see
How I can bear to wait!
You'll find me with my hat and sack,
Out by the garden gate.

And grandma will not care a bit
If you should come, I know;
Because I'm your own little girl,
And I do love you so!

—Sarah E. Eastman, in Golden Days.

Peace at Home.

However brawls disturb the street,
There should be peace at home;
Where sisters dwell and brothers meet,
Quarrels should never come.

Birds in their little nests agree,
And 'tis a shameful sight
When children of one family
Fall out and chide and fight.

Hard names, at first, and threatening words—
They are but noisy breath—
May grow to clubs and naked swords,
To murder and to death.

The wise will make their anger cool,
At least before 'tis night;
But in the bosom of a fool
It burns till morning light.

Oh, pardon, then, our childish rage,
Our little brawls remove,
And as we grow to riper age,
Our hearts will all be love.

Nelly's Fairy.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

There she sat on a cricket, her elbows resting on her knees, and her two hands meeting at the wrists under her chin—little Nelly.

She was dish-washer and chore-girl at the Hadley mansion. The Hadleys were rich and Nelly was poor.

It was Christmas eve, and the family was out, threading the gay streets, stopping, now here, now there, buying knick-knacks of all descriptions, their eyes brilliant and cheeks flushed with pleasure and excitement. The shops were brightly illuminated, and the electric light made the evening like noonday, while the footfalls of the people as they passed and repassed were soft and muffled in the light snow that had fallen, like the tread of dainty children.

Nelly was ordered to stay in and keep the house till some of the inmates returned, and so she sat in the big kitchen, like another Cinderella, while the fire burnt low, and at length only two or three faintly-glowing coals glimmered amid the gray ashes of the range.

"I've read so much about fairy godmothers!" said she, yawning sleepily. "I wonder if I ever had one."

And then she laughed softly at the idea. Her own mother was dead and buried since her babyhood, and her father had disappeared and left her to the tender mercies of the Hadleys.

"But if I only had a fairy godmother, now," whispered Nelly, "what a lot of good things I might hav! I'd hav nice shoes, instead of these great clumsy ones, and a soft garnet cashmere dress—yes, and a pretty pink velvet hat, and a long, white, fleecy plume on it, just like Miss Della's. And nice, warm furs I would hav, too, like Della's—and books, and some music. Oh, it would be so nice to hav a piano, and to be able to get tunes out of it! But I do not suppose there are any fairies now—not any for a poor little hard-working chore-girl like me, anyway," and Nelly sighed wearily.

"There are fairies," sounded a voice, very shrilly, almost at her feet.

"Where?—who?—what?" stammered Nelly, swallowing, and dropping her hands from her chin.

"I am one!" exclaimed the voice, very decidedly.

"You won't hurt me?" pleaded Nelly, inquiringly. "I am a good girl—at least, I try to be, though I forget sometimes," she added.

"Behold me! I will do you good," spoke the voice, encouragingly.

Nelly looked all about, but observed nothing that resembled a fairy.

"Look again!" said the voice.

Nelly looked, but saw no fairy.

"You should look in the unlikely places, as well as the likely ones, when searching for fairies," and the voice sounded sharp and shrill again.

This time she followed the sound, and located it on the mantelpiece, over the range. There lay, snugly coiled up, a simple-looking worm in a cream-white bed. It had been sent to Nelly, and she had received it that day, from her cousin Jerome in the far West.

"You are a worm—at least, I thought you were," gasped Nelly, in astonishment.

"And did you not know before that a worm might be a fairy, also?" said the voice, gently.

"No, sir—no, ma'am—no, Mr. Worm!" said Nelly, catching her breath.

"Ah, you must liv and learn—liv and learn. Miss Nelly," and the worm spoke slowly and calmly.

Nelly thought it very funny that a worm should talk, and, wishing to hear it speak again, she gently stirred it with the end of the poker.

"Ugh!" squealed the worm, as he turned over in his cream-white bed. "What do you punch me for like that? Do you think I'm a car-ticket?"

"Oh, no," said Nelly, "but I wanted to hear you talk a little more—that's all."

"I never talk, little girl, except to some purpose, and, if you will giv me your attention' I will speak a few more words that may result to your advantage, if you will only pay heed to them."

"I will, indeed!" and Nelly spoke very earnestly.

"If I rightly remember, you were just now wishing for handsome shoes, cashmere dresses, books, and pink velvet hats."

Nelly hung down her head.

"Oh, you need not feel ashamed. Good shoes and stockings, books, and pretty clothes are not to be despised. I like to see a girl dress well, if her mind is clothed handsomely, too. But if she is dressed elegantly, and her mind is in rags and tatters, as is the case with some well-dressed people, believe me, she is not of much account, for all her fine clothes. I would not open my eyes to look upon her. Now, my little girl, I can not only show you how to dress yourself nicely—not alone in cashmeres, but in silks—but I can tell you how to dress others, as well."

Nelly opened her large gray eyes inquiringly.

"I perceive you hardly can believe that I do not like my word to be doubted," and the worm twisted and wriggled and stirred his cream-white coverlet. After a pause the voice sounded thin and weak, and as Nelly looked she saw a beautiful little winged creature sitting on the edge of the cream-white bed. It was of a pale yellow color, and had lovely wings, delicately striped and spotted.

"Oh, this is a fairy, sure enough!" exclaimed Nelly, clapping her hands.

"Yes, but a dying one," said the lovely creature. "I shall starve to death, for in this house there is nothing for me to eat. I am the same worm that has been talking to you from the cream-white bed, only I hav changed my shape a little. I am very faint, and know as well as can be that I am passing away; but before I die I wish to tell you a secret, and you must be sure and obey every word I say, and thus you will become very useful, talented, rich, and happy."

The dying creature spoke very faintly, and Nelly could only catch his whispered words by inclining her ear close to his mouth; but she listened with dilated eyes while he told a fairy tale, as it seemed to her. However, she promised to obey instructions, and heed every word that had been spoken.

Soon the Hadleys returned from their shopping excursion, and aroused Nelly from her sleep, for she had fallen asleep there on her low stool, and had been dreaming.

Rubbing her eyes, she said, "I thought I saw a fairy."

"Pooh!" said Della; "you wouldn't see a fairy if one should come in the house, which is not at all likely. Santa Claus may be here, though; it's Christmas eve, and oh, such lovely dolls and things as there are down town! such dear little sets of dishes and doll chairs, and everything!"

Nelly thought how glad she would be to see all the pretty things in the shop windows, but, alas! how could she?

"O Nelly, here is a pair of yarn mittens mamma bought for your Christmas present. She believes in useful presents for servants—mamma does," and Della tossed a pair of red mittens in Nelly's lap.

"Thank you!" said Nelly. "My hands are cold sometimes." But Della was gone, and Nelly was alone again with her reflections.

"It is hard to be a poor little lonely orphan girl, and a servant, but then I guess there are a good many much worse off than I," she mused, as she took her candle and went up to the attic to her little bed.

"What a funny dream it was!" she said; "inspired, I suppose, by the cocoon Cousin Jerome sent me. I will write him about it to-morrow."

And so she wrote a long letter on the morrow, and told her dream to her cousin Jerome.

"A bright idea!" said that young man, when he read her letter. "A fairy, indeed! I'll act upon the fairy's suggestion."

The following spring, he sent little Nelly two or three cocoons of the silk-worm, and some written instructions. In her sunny little room in the attic, Nelly proceeded to business, viz, the raising and hatching of silk-worms, and the making of silk. In the garden of the Hadley's there were two immense mulberry trees, and with the leaves of these she fed her worms.

In course of time Nelly sold the silk her worms had made, and it was woven into fabric. By and by they increased so rapidly, and required so much time, that she was obliged to giv up her situation as "chore-girl" for the Hadley's, and engage a small tenement for herself. The family thought she had gone crazy, and event went so far as to speak to a policement about her. That official investigated the case and reported to the Hadley's: "Let her alone; the girl is all right."

They thought so, when, one day, she called on them, dressed all in beautiful silks. They did not know her, she was so finely attired.

"I am Nelly—once your little 'chore-girl,'" she said.

"What has wrought this great change?" they hastily inquired.

"A fairy!" was her reply, "although Miss Della thought I could never see a fairy, because I was a servant."

The Hadley's paid her much attention when they learned how smart and industrious she had been, and all she had done with the aid of her fairies, as she called her silk-worm moths.

Nelly is very comfortably located now, and employs assistants, but does not humiliate them by calling them servants. "They are my helps," she says. Her leisure moments are employed in studying, and she is becoming a thorough scholar as well as a silk maker.

Kind, gentle, considerate, everyone respects her, and many visit her now large establishment to see her busy little fairies, herself as busy as any of them.

"Had it not been for the visit a fairy paid me in a dream, I suppose I should still be a 'chore-girl' for the Hadley's, but now I am above want, and all has turned out just as the good fairy told me," she said one day. "Of course, I had to work for it," she continued, "and I work now, too, and it is right I should, for we are not entitled to any good thing unless willing to work for it."

ENIGMA.

In a clock, but not in a pail;
In a ship, but not in the sail;
Not in a dam, but in the race;
In a watch, also in the case;
In the tire, but not in the hub;
In a mill, but not in the mud.
Progress without me would end in tears,
With the world set back a thousand years.

NUMERICAL ENIGMA.

The whole, composed of 15 letters, is forty years old.

The 1, 14, 8, 3, 9, is a girl;
The 7, 6, 11 is a fish;
The 15, 13, 2, is a coin;
The 12, 4, 10, is a female name;
The 5 makes Pat part.

DIVINE INTER-POSITION.

The mystic Hamadryades
Were said to liv and die in trees;
Each fabled nymph had given her
An oak for house and sepulcher.
Whether some long-imprisoned toad
First bore the honors of a god,
Or chippering squirrel or singing-bird,
Securely hid, distinctly heard;
Or whether vegetativ power
Was thus embodied in each bower,
I do not now pretend to know—
A stranger puzzle I must show:
A canine 'twixt two ens we see
Ingrowing in a plant or tree;
Yet en passant, I must remark,
Both are alike devoid of bark.

A GHOST OF A NAME.

My Pegasus is in a canter;
Here we go like Tam O'Shanter,
For a ghost is after
With a head of laughter,
Palindromic, somewhat comic,
Reading extremes and center.
It carries a flag of strange design,
Emblazoned with a latin line,
Similia similibus curantur.

Snickers the ghost-head in a banter;
Snickers Pegasus in a canter;
And the ghostly body,
"O Lordy, my Goddy!"
It's palindromic, but not comic,
Read outward from the center;
Singular one way, plural the other;
When in the flesh each is a brother.
Consider the ghostly legs—
My muse your pardon begs—
She means bifurcate pegs—
The plural is single,
The singular double—
Similia similibus curantur.

ANSWER TO H. E. JUERGENS'S DOUBLE ACROSTIC.

The city old, Jerusalem,
And artichoke the plant,
And if together we join them,
We hav the plant we want.
"Jerusalem" from girasole,
It gyrates to old Sol, the sun;
But Christians are so very holy
They slipped into this wretched pun.
Quite the reverse of "Jimson weed,"
Which comes, you know, from Jamestown,
But let us now, at once, proceed
To read the other names down:

1. 'Tis Jerboa I hav found,
   A beast that burrows in the ground;
2. Easter, first a pagan feast,
   Stolen by the Christian priest;
3. A Redout, I comprehend,
   Its "many angles outward tend;
4. The biographic name must be
   The German critic Ulrici;
5. The shumac plant we next approach;
6. Now, tres entendre, see, "A coach;"
7. The L ligo, we next remark;
8. Engage, enlist, invest, embark;
9. Macule, to strain, make somewhat dark.

1. Jerboa; 2. Easter; 3. Redout; 4. Ulrici; 5. Shumac; 6. A coach; 7. Loligo; 8. Embark; 9. Macule; primals, Jerusalem; finals, artichoke; combined, Jerusalem artichoke.

Poetry.

I Climb to Rest.

Still must I climb, if I would rest;
The bird soars upward to his nest;
The young leaf on the tree-top high
Cradles itself within the sky.

The streams that seem to hasten down,
Return in clouds, the hills to crown;
The plant arises from her root,
To rock aloft her flower and fruit.

I cannot in the valley stay;
The great horizons stretch away!
The very cliffs that wall me round
Are ladders unto higher ground.

To work—to rest—for each a time;
I toil, but I must also climb.
What soul was ever quite at ease
Shut in by earthly boundaries!

I am not glad till I hav known
Life that can lift me from my own;
A loftier level must be won,
A mightier strength to lean upon.

And heaven draws near as I ascend;
The breeze invites, the stars befriend,
All things are beckoning to the best;
I climb to thee, my God, for rest!

—Lucy Larcom in the Cottage Hearth.

Why must you climb, if you would rest?
You're not a bird—why build your nest
Among the leaves in tree-top high?
Why cradled be in yonder sky?

Oh, the green earth is sweeter far;
The flowers are bright—why seek a star?
The leaf upon the tree-top high,
When it needs rest, down here must lie.

The plants may rise with joy to work,
Which flowers or fruit may never shirk,
But when at last they seek for rest,
They lie upon the green earth's breast.

So I, though now on mountain top,
Now in the valley find my lot;
Then counting stars on giddy steep;
Anon through waters wading deep;

But am not glad till I hav known
No life can lift me from my own,
But in the depths of my own soul
Find there alone the final goal.

Whatever climbs goes up to work.
No task too hard, no will to shirk;
The day is short, our tasks are done,
We bid good-bye to earth and sun,
Then on the earth's dear bosom lie,
And sink to rest for aye and aye.

Oct. 20th, 1884. MARY A. LELAND.

A Stranger in a Strange Land.

The following words were spoken at the graveside of a poor unfortunate stranger, far from home and friends, buried at Helena, Mont., by Dr. J. L. York:

The occasion which calls us together to-day is one of sadness and sorrow, and, philosophize upon it as we may, the event of death always falls upon the heart with suddenness and sorrow. And whether death enters our own family circle and bears our loved ones away, or whether it be the lonely stranger in a strange land, it comes alike to rich and poor, to peasant and king, falling with crushing weight upon the hearts of the bereaved. We are here to-day, dear friends, to render the last act of kindness to the departed, and to offer our words of sympathy, and, if may be, share the sorrow of those who mourn his loss. The event of death has its lesson for us all; not as taught by the various religions of the world, "Prepare to die"—no, this open grave, and these emblems of death, say to each of us, "Prepare to liv, here and now, better and purer lives."

To my mind, death is not a significant fact, and is only a welcome rest to the poor, worn-out body from suffering and human misery. But life is the central idea, and full of significance. And at such an hour as this, in the presence of death, our minds may be led to grasp, as it were, some of the great and high purposes of life, and in such an hour of quickened thought and feeling we may see a higher purpose in our being than mere sensuous gratification, and feel a deeper and truer sense of our real needs and wants in this life.

That our life may be a success, we need a knowledge of this world and of ourselvs. We need moral power and a love of truth, that we may get the best out of this life. We need good resolutions, and zeal to hold us faithful to every good purpose, word, and work. We need a hope in the possibilities of immortality, to cheer us under the clouds of disappointment and affiiction. We need a love for the good, true, and beautiful, to inspire us with good desires and pure emotions, which shall permeate our whole being and round us out into a beautiful and perfect manhood and womanhood. We need patience to bear the ills of life nobly and bravely; patience to suffer its sorrows, and bear its burdens.

Let us then welcome all of life—and death is but a part of life—a soul set free from sorrow and pain.

Of the departed, our knowledge is limited—of his history and religious faith, it is of no consequence to us to know, nor does it cut any figure in the lesson, purpose, or duty of this hour. We only know that he died as he had lived, free from superstition, a stranger, a wanderer from home and friends, in a strange land, with no kindred near to sooth his sorrow and wipe away the death-frost from his brow; and when the sad news of his death shall reach across the sea to his early home, a kind mother and tender sister will mourn his sad loss.

His virtues let us cherish in our hearts. His faults and frailties, common to us all, let us bury with his body in the grave. Let him rest in the bosom of nature beneath the green sod, while the great world of activ life above his head will move on as before.

The summer sun, and springtime's opening flower; the singing bird, and murmuring brook; the wintry snow, and stormy blast, are one to his poor body we bury to-day. But let us hope that his spirit, freed from the contingencies and misfortunes of earth-life, will rise into a higher, broader, sweeter life beyond the grave, where the evolution of mental and moral life shall still go on, relieved from the temptations of this physical existence, which mar both body and mind, and ever progressing toward the sunlight of a more perfect day. For whether in adversity or prosperity, in life or in death, we are in the hand of eternal, inexorable law, and nature is good to her children and doeth all things well.

"All in a Lifetime."

MISS WIXON'S NOVEL.

The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks.

The character of Philip, the weak but loving husband, is, in particular, admirably drawn, whilst the feminin wiles of the "woman doctor," beautiful as unscrupulous, "hold the mirror up to nature" with a truthfulness of analytic detail I do not remember to hav seen surpassed.

But what pleases me most in this charming story was the unflinching honesty with which its author holds up to the derision of the world the rottenness of average ministerial character, particularly that of revivalist type.

I hav not space here to treat, in detail, of the characters of this truly absorbing novel; suffice it to say that it is safe to predict that anyone who reads its first chapters will be loth to lay it down till the denouement is reached.

Miss Wixon has long been doing a noble work in educating our children into the ranks of true Liberalism, thereby robbing the church of hundreds of those who, in after years, might hav become its willing dupes and servil tools, and she certainly deserves the generous and substantial recognition of all Freethinkers. Let everyone send for a copy of "All in a Lifetime." It will yield a liberal return for the outlay. ELLIOTT PRESTON.

In this Weekly, which is now in the 13th year of its existence, political, social, and religious matters are discussed with a view to general enlightenment and progress. The "Turnzeitung," issued as a supplement to the "Freidenker," is especially devoted to the discussion of topics pertaining to physical culture, and matters of interest to lovers of the gymnastical art.

From January 1, 1885, the "Freidenker" will be enlarged, thus furnishing CONSIDERABLY MORE READING MATTER, while the PRICE WILL REMAIN THE SAME AS BEFORE.

For the convenience of those of our readers who are chiefly interested in matters relating to gymnastics, the "Freidenker" and "Turnzeitung" will be consolidated into one paper, to be called "Amerikanische Turnzeitung," with the sub-heading "Turnerische Ausgabe des 'Freidenker.'"

This paper will contain more reading matter than furnished by both the "Freidenker" and the "Turnzeitung" heretofore. In making these changes, the publishers have incurred great expense, and we therefore solicit the hearty co-operation of all friends of the cause in securing for the "Freidenker" and the "Amerikanische Turnzeitung" a wider circulation.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. The book is quarto in size, and contains 248 pages. No item of expense has been spared to make the work worthy of author and public.

PRICES:

Silk-cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side,	$2 50
Half-calf, mottled edges, elegant library style,	4 50
Full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine,	7 50
Full tree calf, highest possible style and finish,	9 00

Bible Myths, and their Parallels in Other Religions: Being a comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity, considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations. 1 vol. Royal 8vo. 567 pages. Cloth, $4.00.

The object of this work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then to trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning. It contains quotations from nearly all the sacred books of heathen nations, and from other rare and valuable works which are not accessible to people in general. The chapters are so arranged that it is a perfect cyclopedia of reference. Years of research would be necessary to discover all the information it contains. It is a most searching investigation into the origin of Christianity. Every fact is verified by copious notes and authorities, so that it may be trusted as a thoroughly reliable work. It contains information which will be startling to many.

CONSULTING ROOMS,

471 WEST MADISON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

Something for Invalids to read and study over.—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering. Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

Ah! but now is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body. Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we hav treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Gems of Thought.

WHILE we do nothing to injure another, it is the highest and hollest incentiv to increase the happiness of those around us, to make sunshine and joy take the place of gloom and sorrow, and to make sadness and trouble giv way to cheerfulness and peace.—D. M. Bennett.

THE fact that Christ lived in Palestine does not tend to show that he was in any way related to the Holy Ghost; nor does the existence of the Christian religion substantiate the ascension of Jesus Christ. We all admit that Socrates lived in Athens, but we do not admit that he had a familiar spirit. I am satisfied that John Wesley was an Englishman, but I hardly believe that God postponed a rain because Mr. Wesley wanted to preach. All the natural things in the world are not sufficient to establish the supernatural. Mr. Black reasons in this way: There was a hydra-headed monster. We know this, because Hercules killed him. There must hav been such a woman as Proserpine, otherwise Pluto could not hav carried her away. Christ must hav been divine, because the Holy Ghost was his father. And there must hav been such a being as the Holy Ghost, because without a father Christ could not hav existed. Those who are disposed to deny everything because a part is false, reason exactly the other way. They insist that because there was no hydra-headed monster, Hercules did not exist. The true position, in my judgment, is that the natural is not to be discarded because found in the company of the miraculous, neither should the miraculous be believed because associated with the probable. There was in all probability such a man as Jesus Christ. He may hav lived in Jerusalem. He may hav been crucified, but that he was the son of God, or that he was raised from the dead, and ascended bodily to heaven, has never been, and, in the nature of things, can never be, substantiated.—R. G. Ingersoll in the Christian Religion.

IN the obscurity of retirement, amid the squalid poverty and revolting privations of a cottage, it has often been my lot to witness scenes of magnanimity and self-denial, as much beyond the belief as the practice of the great; a heroism borrowing no support either from the gaze of the many or the admiration of the few, yet flourishing amid ruins, and on the confines of the grave—a spectacle as stupendous in the moral world as the falls of Niagara in the natural world.—Colton's Lacon.

DR. JOHNSON has something in common with the fashionable pessimism of modern times. No sentimentalist of to-day could be more convinced that life is, in the main, miserable. It was his favorit theory, according to Mrs. Thrale, that all human action was prompted by "the vacuity of life." Men act solely in the hope of escaping from themselvs. Evil, as a follower of Schopenhauer would assert, is positiv, and good merely the negativ of evil. All desire is at bottom an attempt to escape from pain. The doctrin neither resulted from, nor generated, a philosophical theory in Johnson's case, and was, in the main, a generalization of his experience. Not the less the aim of most of his writing is to express this sentiment in one form or another. . . . We are in a sad world, full of pain, but we hav to make the best of it. Stubborn patience and hard work are the sole remedies, or rather the sole means, of temporary escape.—Leslie Stephen's Johnson.

THE characteristic peculiarity of Dr. Johnson's intellect was the union of great powers with low prejudices. If we judged him by the best parts of his mind, we should place him almost as high as he was placed by the idolatry of Boswell; if by the worst parts of his mind, we should place him even below Boswell himself. When he is not under the influence of some strange scruple, or some domineering passion, which prevented him from boldly and fairly investigating a subject, he was a wary and acute reasoner, a little too much inclined to skepticism, and a little too fond of paradox. No man was less likely to be imposed upon by fallacies in argument or by exaggerated statements of fact. But if, while he was beating down sophisms and exposing false testimony, some childish prejudices, such as would excite laughter in a well-managed nursery, came across him, he was smitten as if by enchantment. His mind dwindled away under the shell from gigantic elevation to dwarfish littleness.—Macaulay.

THE following letter was written by Charles Darwin, so late as June, 1879, to a young student at Jena, whose religious sensibilities had been infringed on by the study of the English naturalist's works, and as, at this time, priests of various creeds are trying to persuade the world that Darwin, like Emerson, was "almost a Christian," it is worth while to read his own account of the matter: "Science and Christ hav nothing to do with each other, except in as far as the habit of scientific investigation makes a man cautious about accepting any proofs. As far as I am concerned. I do not believe that any revelation has ever been made. With regard to a future life, every one must draw his own conclusions from vague and contradictory probabilities."—Pall Mall Gazette.

TWO men I honor, and there is no third. First, the toilworn craftsman that with earth-made implement laboriously conquers the earth, and makes her man's. Venerable to me is the hard hand, crooked, coarse, wherein, notwithstanding, lies a cunning virtue, indefeasibly loyal, as of the scepter of this planet. Venerable, too, is the rugged face, all weather-tanned, besoiled, with its rude intelligence; for it is the face of a man living manlike. Oh, but the more venerable for thy rudeness, and even because we must pity as well as love thee. Hardly-entreated brother! For us was thy back so bent, for us were thy straight limbs and fingers so deformed; thou wert our conscript on whom the lot fell, and fighting our battles wert so marred. For in thee, too, lay a god-created form, but it was not to be unfolded: encrusted must it stand with the thick adhesions and defacements of labor; and thy body, like thy soul, was not to know freedom. Yet toil on, toil on; thou art in thy duty, be out of it who may; thou toilest for the altogether indispensable, for daily bread.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

The political aim of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which are as follows:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

In philosophy, THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates the upbuilding of a rational system that shall lead to better lives on the part of the people, and that shall yield to its adherents all the social and emotional enjoyments of the churches, without any mixture of superstition, or the use of rites and ceremonies degrading to manhood and womanhood. This philosophy must be a growth, an evolution from lower forms, and this growth THE TRUTH SEEKER hopefully fosters. It is, therefore, both destructive and constructive.

Among the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most eminent men and brilliant writers in the Liberal ranks of the United States, including Courtlandt Palmer, Charles Watts, T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, T. C. Leland, C. B. Reynolds, S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, W. S. Bush, Elliott Preston, John Peck, J. L. York, Susan H. Wixon, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Slenker, and many other able men and women. THE TRUTH SEEKER also makes a feature of reprinting the ablest English essayists and philosophers, and during 1884 has given its readers several papers from the pens of Frederic Harrison and Herbert Spencer. The home contributors are legion, and the communications embrace the widest possible range of subjects—religious, philosophic, Anarchistic, Socialistic, land reform, tariff and political reform.

EVERY LIBERAL IN THE COUNTRY WANTS THE TRUTH SEEKER.

DEPARTMENTS:

In the League Department is recorded the news of the National Liberal League, furnished to our columns by the secretary, and other officers of the National and auxiliary Leagues.

We also have an able correspondent in Canada, who furnishes weekly news of the Freethought movement in that dominion.

Our Children's Department is edited by one of the best and most successful writers for children in the United States. Miss Susan H. Wixon is widely known, not only in the Freethought ranks, but as a writer for popular papers and magazines. We have from all sides the strongest testimonials to the efficiency of her work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She will continue the Department through 1885.

Through the department of "Letters from Friends" hundreds of subscribers have made pleasant acquaintances and lasting friendships. Its two pages are a place for exchange of thoughts, relation of experiences, and whatever the friends of Freethought find occasion to say. This department is a "talk together" of great and varied interest.

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER MAY BE GIVEN:

If any of our readers desire to read one of the best Freethought and reform journals published, we should unhesitatingly recommend to them THE TRUTH SEEKER, published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York, at $3 per annum. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a large, sixteen-page paper, and is filled each week with the choicest literature pertaining to Freethought and the overthrow of superstitions. It also ably discusses reforms politically and socially, and is really one of the best papers we have ever read. It is bold and fearless in its denunciations of kingcraft, priestcraft, and all other ways and means by which the people are held in bondage and ignorance, and no one can read THE TRUTH SEEKER a year without becoming nobler and better. You can get the paper three months on trial for fifty cents, and if you try it you will not want to be without it thereafter.—Rochester, N. H., Anti-Monopolist.

One of the finest monuments ever seen in this country has recently been erected to the memory of D. M. Bennett, founder of that able advocate of Freethought, THE TRUTH SEEKER, in Greenwood Cemetery, New York. One thousand friends of the dead journalist, admirers of his sterling qualities and the beauty of thought, goodness of heart, and the self-abnegation which distinguished his life, contributed to the fund by which this magnificent memorial was erected. A colored lithograph of this beautiful memorial has just reached us In reality it is a present that is appreciated more than cold words can express. Besides a view of the monument there is a fine likeness of Mr. Bennett. On the monument are engraved many of the famous utterances of the departed Liberal as well as the record of his life and the work to which many years of his activ manhood were devoted. THE TRUTH SEEKER perpetuates the fame of its founder by this truly generous act, and while accepting its generosity with thanks it is but just and proper that we should add our testimony to that of thousands of others who have many times declared that as an advocate of free thought, free speech, and all that is ennobling in nature THE TRUTH SEEKER has no superior in the universe.—Lackawanna Democrat.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is an iconoclastic journal. The sworn foe of superstition and error in all its forms, its motto might appropriately be, War, war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt—for it never lets a chance go by to hit superstition a resounding blow. It is a first-class exponent of what we call fighting Liberalism. . . . Under the direction of Mr. E. M. Macdonald, it still flourishes. Besides numerous articles of a polemic character, it contains a department for children, "Notes," "News," "Gems of Thought," "Odds and Ends," and numerous letters from correspondents. Besides THE TRUTH SEEKER, the firm publishes also Liberal books, one of the best specimens of which is their last publication, the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, a perfect gem, both in contents and finish, and which we would recommend to be sent for by those who are not yet acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER publications—The Sociologist.

TERMS FOR 1885:

Single subscription,	$3 00	One subscription with three new subscribers, in one remittance,	$8 50
One subscription two years, in advance,	5 00	One subscription with four new subscribers, in one remittance,	10 00

Notes and Clippings.

THE majority vote in favor of taxation of church property in Washington territory was 2,937.

A PAPER called The Overshadowing Power of God is published at Vineland, N. J. Its editor insists that God still retains this peculiar power. As Mr. Herndon would say, "She who reads may run and run quickly."

THE Rev. Spurgeon, London's great preacher, has been floored by one of his female parishioners, who gratefully thanked him for the expression of his firm belief in the bottomless pit, since if the pit was bottomless she could go through and come out high and dry on the other side.

IT is supposed, says the Waterbury American, that the first description of a cigaret is the following, written by Christopher Columbus of the Cuban Islanders, who, he said, had a "filthy habit of rolling up the leaf of a noxious weed, setting fire to one end, and inhaling the pungent and nauseating fumes from the other, which they called tobaccos."

LUCY STONE congratulates her sex on the past year's gains for their cause. Full suffrage for women has been established in Washington territory, and municipal suffrage has been granted to unmarried women and widows of Ontario and Nova Scotia. Municipal suffrage has worked so well in England that the British Parliament has extended it to Scotland.

THE Rev. John J. Kean, pastor of St. James's Roman Catholic church, has founded an organization called the Holy Name Society. The object of the society is to rebuke blasphemers and utterers of obscenity. The Rev. Mr. Kean will find his field of work near home. He should begin with the publishers of the Bible, and those who claim that it is the word of God.

JO COOK has lately lectured all the way from Vancouver's Island through California, and so downward, till now he has reached New Orleans in time for the exposition crowds. The New York World guesses that he is not so anxious to disseminate information as he is to gather in shekels enough to build a summer house at Ticonderoga next to his respected father's residence.

THE Red Bluff Sentinel made this startling announcement one day last week: "The prayer-meeting at the M. E Church will be hell to-night." This typographical error made a good many people believe that something remarkable was to take place at the meeting, so the church was crowded. The officiating brethren, greatly encouraged by the large audience, were inspired to eloquence, and the result was that people went away convinced that the prediction had been fulfilled.

MR. ROSCOE CONKLING, when at Utica, attends Trinity Episcopal church. Just across the aisle from him, it is related, sits an old gentleman named Sherman, for years a prominent politician. He and Mr. Conkling are not on speaking terms. One Sunday, during the recital of the Apostle's Creed, Mr. Sherman paid particular attention to see whether Roscoe bowed his head at the customary place. Mr. Sherman said: "Well, sir, he stood there with his head erect and an expression on his face which said louder than words, 'If the Almighty wants me to bow to him, he must bow first!'"

THE church looks after the morals of Germany, Austria, and Denmark with a vengeance. In those countries they hav among persons of "rank" what is called a morganatic marriage. It is ecclesiastically legal, but not so as regards the civil law. No rank is conveyed to the wife from her husband, and no honor nor hereditary possessions to the children. They take on the rank of their mother, and any property it may be in the power of either parent to giv or leave them. The marriage thus described between persons of royal blood and those of lower positions, when forbidden by the state, is a sort of unacknowledged and barren union, although perfectly moral and sanctioned by the rites of the church.

ROBERT BURDETTE reports a backward state of things in Arkankas. He says that a literary society there recently discussed the question: "Resolved, That a circus is superior to a district school as a civilizing agent." The circus packed the convention from the start. Only one orator got up to speak for the district school. He was the teacher, and the president fined him twice and then made him sit down. The fines were for calling Pompeyeye Pompayee, and saying there were more schools in Boston than in Little Rock, and he was made to sit down for uttering Atheistic sentiments when he denied that "Root, hog, or die," was to be found in the Bible. To crown his disgrace, the president, in summing up, referred to his remarks as indicating to what a low state of knowledge and morals the habit of attending district school would bring a man. He then decided the question in favor of the circus, collecting the fines from the unhappy pedagog, and the society went out and spent the money for bread.

MARK TWAIN, in the Century, relates a story of a colored citizen who was at one time wealthy to the extent of possessing fourteen dollars. This he reduced by unfortunate speculation until he was down to ten cents. Then he tells how that went the way of all the earth: "Well, I 'uz gwine to spen' it, but I had a dream, en de dream tole me to giv it to a nigger name' Balum—Balum's Ass dey call him, for short; he's one er dem chuckle-heads, you know. But he's lucky, dey say, en I see I warn't lucky. De dream say let Balum inves' de ten cents, en he'd make a raise for me. Well, Balum he tuck de money, en when he wuz in church he hear de preacher say dat whoever giv to de po' len' to de Lord, en boun' to git his money back a hund'd times. So Balum he tuck en giv de ten cents to de po', en laid low to see what was gwyne to come of it. Nuthin never come of it. I couldn't manage to k'leck dat money no way; en Balum he couldn'. I ain' gwyne to len' no mo' money 'dout I see de security. Boun' to git yo' money back a hun'd times, de preacher says! Ef I could git de ten cents back, I'd call it squah, en be glad er de chanst."

THE historical preposterousness of carrying of coals to Newcastle, according to the Commercial Advertiser, has been fairly rivaled, if not surpassed, by the carrying of beans to Boston. The consignment, the largest ever known in the bean industry, consisted of four thousand bags, and was taken from this city by a Norwich steamboat. In this simple fact is found a tale and its accompanying moral. The appetite for beans, nourished by what it has so long fed on, has become simply inordinate. Time was when Massachusetts could meet the demands of its capital for this commodity; now the Old Bay State, plus Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, fail to fill the rapacious stomachs that nothing but beans can satisfy. New York has been held up to scorn and derision by the Brahmans of Beacon Hill for its lack of those qualities which are the special glory of the "Hub;" but now that the national metropolis has philanthropically undertaken to furnish brain-food and the essential element of that brand of "culchaw" peculiar to the Modern Athens—if Edinburgh will stand the appropriation—it is not exceeding the bounds of reasonable expectation modestly to hope that, if our beans do not gain us admission to the inner circle of the Bunker Hill coterie, we may at least receive that measure of patronizing toleration that it is not unseemly to bestow upon the humblest who cater for a favorit appetite.

SOMETHING more than a year ago John Swinton, of this city, gave up a lucrativ position on the editorial staff of the New York Sun and started a journal which he called John Swinton's Paper, to be devoted to the interest of labor. He brought to the task a long experience as a journalist and an ability as a writer on labor topics that is probably unexcelled. His paper has been all that the laboring man could reasonably ask for as an advocate of his cause. Yet it has not been supported and it has been a losing venture from the start, and Mr. Swinton in his 63d issue announces that his weekly losses are too severe to be borne long, and unless his subscription list is largely extended it will be impossible for him to go on with the publication. The loss of that paper will be irreparable to the labor cause. It deserves support. The working man, however, will not support it. It is probably doomed. Mr. Swinton, it may be added, has pretty carefully ignored the Freethinkers, though they hav done their best to co-operate with him. He would not extend to THE TRUTH SEEKER the courtesy of exchanging with it. Nevertheless, three copies of his paper come to this office weekly, subscribed and paid for. He has taken the wrong course. The laboring man will never rise from his degraded condition until he throws of the incubus of the church. Let John Swinton help him to do that, and though he fails he will fail in a more glorious cause than any which he has as yet espoused.

BETHANY church, in Baltimore, was built and is sustained by Mr. Charles J. Baker, a wealthy banker of the city, who, on account of "the border" troubles in 1860, withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal church. It is said that it is difficult for Mr. Baker to get a pastor to his liking. As he supports the church mainly, he claims to dictate the pastor's policy, and no man of high character or talent will submit to such an arrangement. The present incumbent—it is an abuse of the term to call him pastor—is an ecclesiastical fop and mountebank. On Friday evening he was dressed in light-colored, almost white, pantaloons, and brown coat a la dude, with cravat and collar to match. His mustache and imperial are in the tip of the style, and his voice sounds like it had been put up in curling-papers. At the close of the exercises he ran up into the pulpit, and posing in a most theatrical style said: "It is my opulent good fortune to hav the best two preachers in attendance upon the Centennial Conference to preach for me on Sunday next. Not that I deserve more, but God (and he rolled his eyes upward and pronounced it Gaad) has sent me the best." He then launched out into a fulsome and disgusting laudation of the preachers who had been appointed to preach there on Sunday. As we came out of the church a lady expressed surprise that such a man should draw the crowd that she understood he drew. A gentleman with her said: "It isn't at all wonderful. People go to see and hear him for the same reason they will stop to see a monkey dodge balls thrown at him or cut amusing antics."—Charleston News.

TROUBLE is reported in the Catholic church at Fall River, Mass. The eastern part of the city, known as Flint Village, is inhabited chiefly by French Canadians, and this is where the trouble is. The Rev. P. J. B. Bedard, who died a short while ago, was pastor of Notre Dame parish. Besides attending to his duties as priest, he was extensivly engaged in business enterprises, and aided his countrymen in every way possible. Since his death the Rev. H. J. Magee, an Irishman, has acted as pastor. The French Canadians objected to him, as they prefer a pastor of their own race. He, however, endeavored to hold his position in spite of the insults and abuse of his parishioners, but his efforts were of no avail. On Sunday, the 14th, the church was closed against him. Although he effected an entrance by forcing the door, he was surrounded by several men and for a while kept prisoner in the church vestry. In the mean time, women and others who entered the church were grossly insulted and ejected from the building. Profanity was freely indulged in, and many so-called sacrilegious acts were perpetrated. The police rescued the clergyman and escorted him to his home. An attempt at night to kidnap him was frustrated by the police, who guarded his house. The conduct of the French aroused the English-speaking Catholics and there is every indication of trouble. The bishop refuses to recall the pastor. The French hav subscribed $750 to send a delegation to Rome to lay the matter before the pope. These Kanucks are strangely inconsistent. While they object to an Irish pastor because of his nationality, they still, by their action in appealing the case, acknowledge the authority of Pope Leo, the Italian clown.

News of the Week.

THE condition of Germany is said to be critical, owing to the Socialistic element of society.

PRATT'S oil works in Brooklyn were destroyed by fire last Sunday. The loss is placed at $500,000.

OFFICIAL advices hav been received at Rome of the massacre of the Catholic missionaries at Bianchi in Central Africa.

A TREATY between Spain and the United States is pending. The treaty provides for a reciprocal reduction of duties.

SENATOR MAHONE, of Virginia, in a suit against the Southern Telegraph Company, has retained Gen. Butler as counsel.

ANOTHER scheme to kill the czar of Russia has been unearthed. This time the scene of the contemplated slaughter was on the Gatschina railway.

PRESIDENT AUSTIN CORBIN, of the Long Island Railroad, presents each of his employees with a turkey on Christmas day. It takes ten tons to go around.

THE town of Traverse, in Dakota, is the scene of a riot arising from ballot-box stuffing and intimidation at the polls on election day. State troops are to be ordered to the scene.

TWENTY-FOUR lives were lost by the burning of the St. John's orphan asylum in Brooklyn last week. Many children are still missing, and it is thought a thorough search of the ruins may result in the discovery of more bodies.

PASTOR THOMPSON, of the Grace M. E. church in Brooklyn, is missing, and his congregation do not know where to look to find him. It is thought that he has wandered away to foreign parts in a fit of mental aberration. His reputation is good.

THE Brooklyn New England Society celebrated last Saturday evening the 264th anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, on account of his position in the recent presidential election, was not invited.

LAST week's cold snap wound up with a snow storm on Saturday night, which turned to rain on Sunday. During the cold weather the thermometer ranged below zero from eight to thirty-eight, several persons were frozen to death, cattle and poultry were killed, and peach trees destroyed.

THE New Orleans Exposition opened on Tuesday of last week in the presence of 15,000 persons. Things were so arranged that by touching an electric button in Washington President Arthur set the machinery of the Exposition in motion. The doors were open on Sunday and the attendance was very good.

THE Rev. Charles B. Smith and the Rev. Dr. Gawn Campbell both desired to preach in the United Presbyterian church in this city last Sunday. The Rev. Mr. Smith prevailed by engaging a big policeman to restrain the Rev. Dr. Campbell while he (the Rev. Mr. Smith) ascended the pulpit and got in his work. The United Presbyterian church is not as united as it was.

THE services at Christ Episcopal church in Brooklyn were interrupted by a fire last Sunday, and the congregation had to get out of the building to prevent being scorched. would seem that those who are so anxious to save God's children from fire in the next world might reasonably expect to be protected from it in this, at least while engaged in prosecuting their great work.

THE inhalation of an irrespirable gas, produced by burning coal, in the Methodist Sunday-school at Fayetteville, N. C., last Sunday, produced among the teachers and children a condition of partial suffocation. Some fifteen children and a few of the instructors fell from their seats prostrate and fainting. But for the immediate admission of fresh air, fatal results must hav ensued. The school librarian may not recover.

Communications.

Less God and More Sense.

The following article was written for the Steuben Signal, but after mature deliberation I became convinced that it would never be given a place in a Christian newspaper, and thought I would let it go as still-born. Finally I concluded to send this to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and wrote a shorter article, in which I drew it mild but firm, with a faint hope that it might be published, and here is the result:

"We hav received a well written article from the pen of Mr. John Peck, of Naples, a reader of the Signal from its first publication. The article sets forth Mr. Peck's theological and humanitarian views in terse terms, and shows him to be a man of decided convictions. The theological part of the communication is a little out of our line, but his humanitarian views include the prohibition of the rum traffic; and that is where we agree with him. He says: 'Heaven will be here on e rth if each strives to promote the other's happiness. Hell will be enlarged in proportion as we are neglectful of the welfare of our fellows. The rum traffic is wickedly cruel in its consequences. My object is to induce men to giv their best energies to relieve human suffering.' Would that there were more men who entertained these sentiments."

Here you see he has published just enough of my article to mislead his readers and misrepresent me. After blowing his heaven and hell clear out of sight, it was perfectly proper to say that "heaven will be here on earth if each strives to promote the other's happiness," etc. But the way he has quoted me he has misrepresented me entirely. Worse than all, he says, "Would that there were more men who entertained these sentiments," and still this putty-headed Christian had not the courage to let his readers know what "these sentiments" were. Is there one Christian who is not a bigot? "The theological part of the communication is a little out of our lime"—so is true courage and lofty manhood. Christianity invariably robs a man of both.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE STEUBEN SIGNAL, Sir: In many respects you publish the best paper I ever read. Its selections of articles and topics are such as deeply interest me, and it is all the time telling me just what I most want to know.

Indeed, if I had the privilege of asking questions, and having them answered each week, the paper would not be more satisfactory. And then it is one of the most consistent and aggressiv temperance papers with which I am acquainted.

I object to your paper only because you get too much God and Christianity into it. Not too much humanity, but too much Christianity. For years I hav been a stanch temperance man. I hav even been called rabid.

I did not vote for Mr. St. John, because I dare not trust your "divine master" for a ruler, nor the Bible as the foundation of all law. As terrible as the rum traffic and the liquor dealer hav seemed to me, I fear them less than I do the power of the church and ecclesiasticism.

The landlord has starved the children, brought disgrace upon the family by laying the father in the gutter, but I never heard of one applying the lash with a strong arm to the naked back of a defenseless woman in public, as has been done in New England at the behest of the church.

The early history of New England reveals many instances of women being publicly whipped, and then dragged at the tail-end of Christian carts through the public streets.

Not because they had committed any offense against morality, but because they had committed an offense against the church. And this among a people so full of Christianity that they knocked the horns off of cows for having calves on Sunday, and flogged barrels of beer for working on the same day.

Everything was made to conform to the teaching of the Bible, and a more tyrannical and inhuman people I hav scarcely read of than these Christian bigots. The place is still pointed out to-day on Boston Common where these Christian people whipped women and hung witches. Helpless old women were bound in sacks and thrown into ponds, and otherwise tormented until life was extinct, because it was written in an old book, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv."

These people made the Bible the "foundation of law," just what you propose to do. The same causes produce the same effects.

"We, the people [not God], do ordain and establish this Constitution." And "this Constitution [not the Bible] shall be the supreme law of the land." No room for holy ghosts, or talking asses, or snakes that beguile women.

Don't try to do too much for your God. Suffering humanity needs all the help you can reasonably render. If God is just such a being as you represent him to be, he needs none of you assistance. Besides, "you could not help him if you would, and he would not hav you if you could." More than all, he never did and never can help us. Whenever we most need his help he is sure to hav some other business on hand, and does not put in an appearance.

Furthermore, our Constitution has served a very good turn, and it is not best to spoil a good thing with a bad God—one who gets mad and "swears in his wrath," and kills little children, and "rips up women alive," and "puts lying spirits into the mouths of his prophets."

I am not particularly proud of those nations which get too much God and Bible into their laws—Spain, Portugal, and Russia, for instance. Hundreds of grand men hav had the pride and courage of manhood tortured out of them in the mining prisons of Russia, where the head of the government rules by divine right. Only to-day I was reading how these Christian cannibals drink the hot blood of a dying child, stabbed to the heart with a silver spoon in remembrance of him who died on Mount Calvary.

Rome is one of the most Christian cities in the world, and yet for drunkenness, debauchery, and "pure cussedness," it has no equal on the face of the globe. These are terrible lessons for those who are "hell bent" on having God in the Constitution, and making the "Bible the foundation of law."

The Prohibition party may succeed, but woe, woe to the day if this dreadful object is accomplished.

During the "Dark Ages" every one prayed to God, and worked for God, and lived for God, and fought for God. The cross was upon ever building, and banner, and garment. The wisdom of this world was folly compared to the teaching of the Bible as the priests interpreted it.

Ignorance hung like a pall over Europe for a thousand years. All institutions of learning, except for the priesthood, were discouraged. Ninety per cent of the people could not write their own names. This was a great day for the church and ecclesiasticism, but was it a happy period in the world's history? Surely such lessons ought to satisfiy all right-minded men for all coming time, and damn the man to eternal infamy who would attempt to lead this nation back to the darkness of ignorance to hear again the wail of ecclesiastical oppression.

God in the Constitution! The Bible the foundation of law, and Christ the acknowledged ruler! Must the hands move backward on the dial? Never, never, never! Ponder this seriously, my countrymen, or the time may come when you may be arraigned before the courts, as they were in New England, to show cause why you absented yourself from church on Sunday.

Nearly all the gunpowder that has been murderously wasted has been used by one Christian nation to blow out the brains of some other Christian nation. And if there was a lull in war, the time was filled up by roasting and gibbeting Infidels and heretics.

The very refinement of cruelty was reached during the days of the Inquisition. Cropping the ear, slitting the nose, branding the letter "B" in the forehead, and boring the tongue with a hot iron, were considered slight penalties to be inflicted upon those who exposed the gull-traps of superstition, and laid bare the tricks of the priesthood.

In some states a man's dearest friend might be murdered before his eyes, and his oath would not be allowed to bring the murderer to justice, because he is not considered sound on the theological goose.

What would you think, Mr. Editor, if you were in a court of justice, and such a man as Ethan Allen or Thomas Jefferson was brought upon the witness stand and not allowed to testify? I was told only a short time ago that no jury ought to pay any attention to the oath of an Infidel. And yet men are voting by the thousands to place more power in the hands of the priesthood, and make the Bible, and not the Constitution, the "supreme law of the land." God in the Constitution is the death-knell of freedom. It would literally giv the church power over the state, which would be a subversion of the government.

Thousands who voted with the Prohibition party thought only of promoting the cause of temperance. But should that party succeed, they will get, when too late to be undone, vastly more than they bargained for. The moment any system of religion is recognized by the Constitution, the government is changed. The government must grant no special privileges either to the Christian religion, the Mohammedan, the Buddhist, the Mormon, or any other system of religion. Neither must any God be recognized in the Constitution, whether Allah, Christ, "Jehovah, Jove, or Lord." All are to be tolerated, all are to be protected, but all must remain on a level so far as the favor of the government is concerned. No pet Gods. No system of religion upheld by law. No taxes to pay ministers or chaplains, or to sustain churches contrary to the wishes of men. Nobody is to be "cram'd," in this country, either with Bibles or Gods.

If no undue power is put into the hands of the Christians, they certainly will not abuse it. All through the long centuries the peaceful teachings of the meek and lowly Jesus hav been inculcated by fire and sword, whenever there has been power to do so. The thumb-screw has been made to "touch the heart" when the mind refused assent to the dogmas of the church.

The claim that the church and the priesthood put up, that they are only anxious to hav the government recognize the fact that there is a God, and that no advantage would ever be taken of it, is only the wolf's paw that is ill concealed by the sheep's covering. What would these Christians say if the Mormons should attempt to get a clause in the Constitution upholding polygamy, under the pretense that they never would take advantage of it?

Because I cannot believe that God ever spoke through a jackass, or because I do not believe a thousand other holy absurdities, I do not want to be deprived of the privilege of testifying in a court of justice. Because I do not believe that a son can beget a father as well as a father can beget a son, I do not want to lie in prison. And yet, within my remembrance, a man in this country lay in jail three months for saying that very thing.

Whenever a man honestly believes that he can do something for the glory of God, he becomes a dangerous man if power is placed in his hands. He at once assumes that he ought to "obey God rather than man," and, no matter how inhuman an act may be, if he imagins that it would be pleasing to God, he would do it, no matter how much human interests might suffer. Heretics hav been burnt and Infidels tortured because it was believed that they were hateful in the sight of God.

Moody in one of his sermons represented a girl sixteen years old as kneeling down on her bare knees on the red-hot bottom of hell and praying God for just one moment's respit.

Anybody who believes in such a savage God, and that such punishment is merited, would roast or flay an innocent girl alive if he believed that her conduct was such as to "provoke God to wrath."

Here lies the danger with the Christian. God is everything; humanity is nothing. The most cruel monsters of earth hav been those who sought to exterminate people or sects who, they believed, were living in violation of God's commands.

Whenever there is power to put God into the Constitution, or make the Bible the foundation of law, that power will be the sole judge of what God requires. If that time ever comes, every Christian will be fumbling through the old Jew book to find a "Thus saith the Lord."

Now, my Christian friend, before you make up your mind that any man can be trusted who takes the Bible for his guide, I want to call your attention to just a few passages of scripture, which, if they are the word of God, would show that he has no business in the Constitution, and which, if they were made the law of the land, would sink us into a state of barbarism. I might select hundreds of passages which would disgrace a barbarian on account of their brutality and obscenity, but shall content myself with only a few specimen bricks, imbedded in untempered mortar which no decent God ever spread. My Christian friend, you will hav to excuse me, for I never had a very nigh notion of your God since he forced good old Zeke to take the homeopathic pill.

A man who is noted for truthfulness commands the respect of all, while a noted liar and deceiver is the most despised among men. Now, if the Bible sanctions lies and deception, should it be made the foundation of law? Let us see.

"Being crafty, I caught you with guile." "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" (Rom. iii, 7). "Now, therefore, behold the Lord hath put a lying spirit into the mouth of all these thy prophets" (1 Kings xxii, 23). "If the prophet hath been deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I, the Lord, hav deceived that prophet" (Ezek. xiv, 9).

Is God the author of that language? If so, do we want such a God in the Constitution? Now, my pious friend, suppose a man should testify falsely against you, and wrong you deeply both in purse and character, and you should call him to account, and he should tell you that the Lord had put a lying spirit into his mouth, how could you disprove it if you believe the scriptures to be the word of God?

"Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt giv it to the stranger that is in thy gates that he may eat it, or thou mayest sell it unto an alien" (Deut. xiv, 21).

What kind of government would this be if every nativ-born citizen had the privilege of selling stinking meat to every English, Irish, French, Dutch, and Scotchman, to every German, Swede, Italian, Spaniard, etc., and every hotel and boarding-house could feed their guests and boarders on tainted meat? If this is the language of God, I hope he won't start a meat market in our town very soon.

"Slay both man and woman, infant and suckling" (1 Sam. xv, 3). "Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children" (Ezek. ix, 6).

These passages would be far more appropriate pasted on the bludgeon of a highwayman than they would as a rule of action for the American people.

"And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captivs and their little ones, and took the spoil of their cattle, and all their flocks and all their goods. And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles with fire" (Num. xxxi, 10). "And we utterly destroyed the men and the women and the little ones of every city" (Deut. ii, 34).

Such language would be very proper to adorn the walls of a cave of a band of robbers, but let us be slow to weave it into the laws of our country.

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." (Mark xvi, 16).

O my Liberal friends, beware of the day when the Christians are clothed with power to deal with us as unbelievers, believing that we are the enemies of God and hell-deserving. I would as soon be under the paw of a tiger as in the hands of Christians who hav power over me, and who believe that God spoke those words.

"Their houses shall be spoiled, and their wives ravished" (Isa. xiii, 16). "The city shall be taken and the houses rifled, and the women ravished" (Zech. xiv, 2). "Let their wives be bereaved of their children and be widows" (Jer. xviii, 21).

O woman, how can we expect that you can expect that we can respect you, when you hav no more respect for yourself than to respect a book that never showed any respect for woman? How long will you glory in being outraged and degraded by such a book? For your sake "I will die in the last ditch," "shouting the battle cry of freedom," before such a book shall be made the foundation of law in this country.

"Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes" (Isa. xiii, 16). "And there came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them" (2 Kings ii, 24). "They shall fall by the sword, and their infants shall be dashed in pieces" (Hosea xiii, 16).

Here is protection for the innocent little cotton-heads. When the Christians get this God into the Constitution, they had better put in the "other feller," too.

"The father shall eat the sons in the midst of thee, and the sons shall eat their father' (Ezek. v, 10).

> This beats any fiend that in hell ever trod;
> Hooraw, Christian friends, for the cannibal God.

"And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat" (Lev. xxvi, 29). "And I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and they shall eat every one the flesh of his friend" (Jer. xix, 9). "And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters" (Deut. xxviii, 53).

O ye Christian cannibals, when you get this God into the Constitution, and these beautiful scripture quotations woven into the law of the land, invite in the Battas of Sumatra, the Brazilian aborigines, the Tasmanian nomads, the Fans from Africa, and all the blood-sucking, man-eating monsters wherever found, to join you in your Christian festivals. Then when they are dancing around the roasting infants smeared with human blood, with strings of skulls around their necks, shaking the death rattle, you will begin to realize that "there is an eternal fitness of things," that if God is the author of the above quotations he would fairly squeal with delight at the scene, and the attending smoke would enter his nostrils as a sweet savor.

"And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever" (Lev. xxiv 46).

My Christian friends, do you realize that those who fought for slavery fought for the Bible, and those who fought to put down slavery fought against the Bible? The hearts of millions of slaves would die in them if they knew that this scripture was to be made the law of the land.

Then think of Solomon, and David, and Gideon, and Jacob, and Abraham, all special pets of this God of the Constitution, surrounded with fancy women ranging in numbers from two to a thousand each; lustful old patriarchs every one, fit subjects for the youth of both sexes to imitate! Why, if the Bible should be made the law of the land, a shout would go up from all Mormondom.

"Thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after [could anything be more despicable?], for oxen or for sheep, or for wine or strong drink" (Deut. xiv, 26). "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more" (Prov. xxxi, 6, 7). "Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart" (Eccles. ix, 7). "Bring them into the house of the Lord, into one of the chambers, and giv them wine to drink" (Jer. xxxv, 2).

If I were a rum-seller I would hav my saloon decorated with just such passages of scripture. Make the Bible the "foundation of law," and every rum-seller would shout himself hoarse, and every drunkard would be singing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." I would think that St. John, and particularly the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, would be greatly interested in having these last passages, relating to wine and strong drink, incorporated into the law of this land. There must be a terrible curse resting upon Maine, for the prohibitory law is contrary to scripture, and the people never could hav passed it without forgetting what God has said about wine and strong drink, and he has declared that "all the nations that forget God shall be cast into hell." Now, I defy any man quote an equal number of passages from any book more diabolical in their consequences than those which I hav quoted from the so-called word of God, And yet this word of God is to be made the "foundation of law" in this country. God is to be put into the Constitution, and Christ is to be made the acknowledged ruler. What the church and the clergy cannot accomplish openly they seek to accomplish by stealth. The rank and file passes think they are working and voting for temperance, while the church and the clergy hav so cunningly manipulated the platform as to make every vote cast for prohibition a vote also to put God into the Constitution, and to make the Bible the foundation of law.

Every Liberal-minded man should be detailed to stand on guard. Every prohibition vote was a vote for God in the Constitution. The church always works with an eye single to its power. Had it not been for allegiance to the old parties, the prohibition vote would hav been doubled.

For a long time I gave my nickels and quarters (far more than I was able to spare) to help on the cause of temperance; but when I came to see clearly that every dime thus expended was indirectly given to the church, I ordered a halt all along the line. I would no sooner giv money to build up church tyranny than I would forge prison bars for the innocent.

It is said by the church and the clergy that the prohibition movement must be carried forward, that it must be made a success in 1888. If the Bible is made the foundation of law, the Comstocks will be multiplied, the bolts will not be allowed to rust in the locks of Christian prisons. For writing such an article as this an old man like me would be put behind the bars to learn the ways of God in the Constitution. Rather a thousand times all the demons of rum should be let loose than such a hellish scheme consummated.

JOHN PECK.

Free Will and Anarchy.

One of your late numbers contains a letter from "Edgeworth," in which he quotes some statements of mine published in the Radical Review in regard to free will and anarchy.

Mr. Tucker has answered these statements in the Radical Review, and so does "Edgeworth" in his letter. It is with pleasure that I note these answers, and I will quote them here for the benefit of your readers.

Mr. Tucker says: "Mr. Chavannes can know this [that Mr. Tucker believes in free will] only from my own assertions, which hav always been to the effect that the realization of anarchy is not a matter of the will, but of the understanding, and that there is nothing more absurd than the position of these miscalled anarchists, who fondly fancy that if they can only get the people angry enough, and lead them on to bloody revolution under a banner bearing the word 'anarchy' inscribed on its folds, a perfect state of freedom will arise from the ruin. I hav stated this repeatedly, and as plainly as I know how; if Mr. Chavannes so utterly misconceives my meaning in this particular, he certainly will in others. The fact is, that beyond certain limits he has not a discriminating mind. He gets out of his element and flounders. Do you suppose I am going to enter into a discussion with such a person? Not much!"

Edgeworth answers it in this manner: "Mr. Chavannes is perfectly well aware that the earnest soldiers of liberty, to whom he refers, are conscious of the difficulties and delays incident to a profound and radical change in public opinion on the subject of government and the substitution of free contract for the ballot or majority representation. He knows that we anticipate no sudden revolution, and need no metaphysical commentaries on the human will. To turn the tables on him, we need only remark that he who wills the end wills the means," etc.

Now, I must confess that all this is new to me. From reading the editorials of Liberty, and from all I hav read from anarchist writers, I had come to the conclusion that all that was wanted was the "will" to put down all forms of governments, and that out of the ruins a perfect social state would arise; that nothing but the power and tyranny of organized governments prevented a society founded upon equal rights, and where much better condition would obtain. Mr. Tucker, or one of his co-editors, has compared the restraints of government to the mud and quagmires upon a highway, and liberty to the solid road underneath, upon which individuals would travel to happiness, and all that was needed was to throw overboard the government encumbrances, and a perfect social state would be found underneath. Besides that, all the examples of anarchist societies they giv are of tribes in Greenland, or Alaska, or some such countries, and never any mention is made of these peoples being able to maintain that form of society because of their superior intelligence. But now I know better; we cannot hav anarchy without using certain means, says "Edgeworth," and Mr. Tucker proclaims that it is a matter of the understanding, and not of the will. If this is the case, I suppose we shall soon hav a new departure in the tactics of Mr. Edgeworth, Tucker & Co. Till now they hav been very activ in playing upon the will, but hav done little to increase the intelligence, nor hav they said much about the means except the destruction of the state.

Mr. Ward tells us—and he ought to be good authority—that an increase of intelligence is based upou an increase of knowledge, and an increase of knowledge is due to a clearer understanding of nature's laws. If that is the case, whatever increases popular knowledge increases intelligence, and, according to Mr. Tucker, favors anarchy.

Now, Mr. Tucker has, till now, carefully abstained from writing anything that might increase popular intelligence, and I call upon him, in the name of his new declaration of faith, to go to work at once and make up for lost time; and not only do I call upon him to do so, but I will point out to him two questions of popular interest, upon which, according to his own statements, the people's knowledge is very deficient, and upon which he is perfectly competent to teach them.

The first is, how we shall secure mortgages under anarchy. The common people is so ignorant that his short answer on this question, as given in your paper some time ago, and commented upon in an editorial entitled, "Orderly Anarchy," has not satisfied them that the thing could be done. A clear explanation, showing conclusivly to the most ordinary mind, how voluntary associations can replace government, and do the work in a satisfactory manner, would greatly increase the popular understanding, and be a great argument in favor of anarchy.

The next is the question of free banking. Those of us who remember what went under that name in the past hav quite a prejudice against it, but Mr. Tucker says that our objections do not apply to Green's mutual banking. I am so ignorant as to believe that they do, and I am willing to try to prove it, and I hav offered to discuss the question at length with Mr. Tucker in the Radical Review, but Mr. Tucker declines for reasons that seem satisfactory to him. Now, considering that anarchy is based upon the understanding, and not on the will, and that the understanding, or intelligence, is based upon knowledge, and that the common mind is so ignorant as to believe that a greenback currency is cheaper, safer, more difficult to counterfeit, more convenient, and of wider circulation than any currency they might hav under any system the anarchists propose, would it not be well for Mr. Tucker or "Edgeworth" to devote some of their valuable time to enlighten the popular mind, and thus increase its intelligence?

ALBERT CHAVANNES.

Mrs. Tillotson's Annual Protest.

Nearly two thousand years of penal rule fail to commend Anno Domini. They hav been successions and degrees of tyrannic sway and barbaric customs, which enlightening Progress moved slowly against, and only obtained the aid of unmartyred Science less than three hundred years ago. Present knowledge of moral darkness, so long sacrificing the suffering millions to the crowned and mitered few, diffused light that should now bring justice and rejoicing, demand a Science Calendar, and awaken effort for equity. Nations beset by adverse policy hav constant struggle for freedom after they hav won by blood, treasure, and honorable triumph, the acknowledged title of Democracy. This nation, constituted on the plan of equality and freedom of conscience, finds its functions warped to despotic uses, to the danger and detriment of citizens. This evil falls on both sexes alike; but the subjection of woman to man's mastery, which forces obedience to laws she is refused a voice and choice in, makes a sex caste farther degrading to all, and lays the cruelty on her. If woman with unmolested right to toil, though against the odds of unequal wages and vicious sentiment, earns a home, it is taxed to support a government that insults her intelligence and genius. If she refuses to deliver the demanded sum, though it violates her conscience and the country's constitution, which bases taxation on representation, her home is confiscated. While this exaction goes on, laws are made exempting from taxation men who fought to preserve the laws. My townsmen know my conscience, reason, and their laws too, forbid using public money and public schools for sectarian purposes; yet nearly half the sum robbed from me this year consists of a special amount for the graded school, where sectarian reading and praying are parts of the daily culture.

Against these and other usurpations thwarting the design of the founders of the nation, who aimed at a veritable republic, I protest. Against discriminations of sex, dooming woman to manifold slaveries, I protest. Against all these indignities, in my own behalf I invite all who know they are compelled to ignoble submission, to join with me to protest—to scorn sham usage and venal suasion that cause inefficiency; to take rights the law cannot wrest, and by them gain bodily health, which yields strength of purpose and practical power.

Herewith I record my inherent, human demand for justice, in this year of Science 284.

Vineland, N. J. MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Canadian Notes.

"Freethought: Its Nature, Struggles, and Achievements," was the theme of Charles Watts, last night, in Albert Hall before an overflowing house, many failing to gain admittance. He showed that observation, experience, and reflection are the rocks on which the structures of Secularism and freedom of thought are founded, while Christian dogmas and theological superstitions are erections whose foundations are quicksands—they are the relics of the barbarism of primitiv man, and the inventions of priestcraft to enslave the minds of the people. The Toronto clergy either do not believe in the Christianity that they preach, or are afraid [illegible] Mr. Watts will vanquish them in debate. The Toronto Daily Mail endeavors to crush freedom of inquiry by refusing to advertise Freethought meetings—it is the only Toronto daily that is guilty of this injustice. At 10:30 a lecture on the Sabbath question was given by John E. Remsburg of Kansas, great applause greeting his numerous telling points. At 12:30 the subject of the "New Work of Secularism" was treated in a philosophical manner by S. P. Putnam of New York city, secretary of the National Liberal League.

Mr. Charles Watts made his bow before a Toronto audience for the first time as an actor both of tragedy and comedy, in both of which he appears to excel. Perhaps he showed to greatest advantage in comedy. Shakspere's Othello tested his capacity as a tragedian, and he was not found wanting, albeit, trying as was the ordeal through which he had to pass. His support by Mr. Harrison, in the part of Iago, was excellent. As a comedian, Mr. Watts's acting in the part of Sir Edward Ardent, the hero of "A Warning Call," was satisfactory in the extreme.

The preceding lectures and dramatic performances formed part of the program of the Convention. These, together with the concert and ball, and reception and concert, were attended by delegates from Freethought societies in all parts of Canada. Reception and concert on Saturday evening, ball and supper on Monday evening, three lectures, concert, and recitations all day on Sunday. Crowded houses.

The Toronto World gave daily reports of the meetings of the Convention of Freethinkers from all parts of Canada. On Monday its report of Saturday's Convention was headed with black lines, "Freethought Convention," "Delegates of Secularism in Town," "Three Meetings in Albert Hall." "The Freethinkers hav adopted the convention as a mode of holding counsel together, and for the purpose of devising plans for the dissemination of their tenets. On Saturday the initial meeting was held, at which some routine business was transacted in the way of receiving delegates and striking committees. In the evening the members of the convention assembled in the rooms of the Toronto Secular Society, and became better acquainted with each other. Crowded audiences attended the Sunday meetings, scores were unable to obtain admission to hear Mr. Watts. Quite a number of ladies were in attendance. An appeal was also made for funds to carry on the activ propagandist efforts which the Secularists intend to make in all parts of Canada. About seventy-five delegates arrived on Saturday morning, and they continue to arrive all the time. Among them are representativs of Lindsay, Port Hope, Penetanguishene, Collingwood, Aylmer, Napanee. Orwell, Simcoe, Ottawa, Montreal, Owen Sound, Meaford, Bradford, Pembroke, Chatham, Belleville, and many other localities in all parts of Canada. We noticed among the veterans of Freethought W. McDonnell, of Lindsay; James Brown, of Galt; W. Sisson, of Port Hope; John Groom, of Meaford; Albert White, of Orwell, and many other pillars and landmarks of Freethought during the last twenty or thirty years." The following officers were elected: J. I. Evans, president; R. B. Butland, secretary; J. A. Risser, corresponding secretary; John Taylor, treasurer; committee, J. Harrison, George Piddington, A. Earsman, Charles Hicks, G. McFedries, T. Strange, Charles Peters. In the evening an entertainment was given at which Messrs. Piddinton, Hicks, Edwards, Harrison, and Watts, and the Misses Strange, Verral, Miller, and Mrs. Marton, Mrs. Miller, and Mrs. Watts assisted. The musical and literary contributions were followed by a supper and ball; music by a first-class orchestra, and the ball room decorated with innumerable flags, banners, and mottoes, blended in festoons, and Stars and Stripes, British ensigns, union jacks, and Canadian banners, interspersed with silk bannerets inscribed, Democritus, Lucretius, Bruno, Darwin, Tyndall, Comte, Kant, Buckle, Spencer, Huxley, Haeckel, and other lights of modern scientific Materialism.

Mrs. Charles Watts made her first appearance on the platform in Toronto on Sunday night last, as a public reader and reciter. The subject she selected partook of the character of light comedy. The fair elocutionist displayed dash and vivacity which infused the audience with her own sprightliness and overflowing animal spirits. Many passages she delivered with "glances shy" and an archness that were perfectly irresistible and fairly carried th[illegible] storm.

Taylor says the doctrin of the trinity i[illegible]e house by the legend of Prometheus. Again, Pro[illegible]s taken from actly answering to the Christian pers[illegible]metheus, ex- providence, is, like that personificatio[illegible]nification of epithet synonymous with the suprem[illegible]n, used as an The pagan phrase, "Thank Prome[illegible].e deity himself. as the Christian one, "Thank pr[illegible]cheus," is the same interpretation meant exactly, "T[illegible]ovidence;" its literal Orphic hymn to Chronos (Satu[illegible]hank God." In the lime address to th[illegible]n), we hav this sub- [illegible] address to the supreme deity under his name Prometheus: "Illustrious cherishing father, both of the immortal gods and of men; various of counsel; spotless, powerful, mighty Titan, who consumest all things, and again thyself repairest them; who holdest the ineffable bonds throughout the world; thou universal parent of successiv being; various of design; fructifier of the earth and of the starry heavens; dread Prometheus, who dwellest in all parts of the world; author of generation, tortuous in counsel, most excellent; hear our suppliant voice and send to our life a happy, blameless end. Amen."

Monday night last witnessed the debut in Toronto of Mrs. Charles Watts as an actress. The play selected for her first appearance was Charles Dance's comedietta, "A Morning Call," in which she displayed the most consummate ability. It was a graceful, artistic, and finished piece of acting. Mrs. Watts has a commanding and fascinating stage presence. Bounteous nature has been peculiarly lavish in her gifts to this "fortune's favorit." She is simply bewitching, and if Mrs. Chillingbone at all resembled her lovely impersonator of the evening, we pity the aching heart of poor Sir Edward.

Toronto, Dec. 20, 1884. R. B. Butland.

The Liberal Club.

It was a cold, cold night when the Manhattan Liberal Club held its 358th meeting. The ultimate destination of the popular sinner must hav been a good ways off that evening. People skipped hurriedly along the streets, holding on to their ears at the expense of comfort to their hands, or pocketing their hands at the risk of freezing their ears. The holiday things displayed in shop windows were hidden and eclipsed in beauty by the frost-work upon the pane, which took on forms and designs that for general attractivness will take and hold the cake until the illustrations in "The Story Hour" meet the public gaze. Nevertheless, between half-past seven and eight o'clock a considerable number of persons entered the German Masonic Temple, turned down their coat collars, and seated themselvs to hear Professor Rawson lecture on the true inwardness of mythology, especially the Hebrew and Christian. While Dr. Foote, Jr., was getting the range with his polyopticon, Mr. Chamberlain and Deacon Deane took up a contribution of about $15 toward the defense of the man Conroy, whom Anthony Comstock is prosecuting for selling a photograph of unexceptionable chastity. The lights were turned off after this, and the polyopticon was turned on. The pictures exhibited a large and assorted variety of almighty gods, each of which had at one time or another, in an idle moment, created the universe. Most of them were queer-looking fellows. They are now no more. One of the first was the Egyptian deity Osiris. He had a hawk's head, upon which he carried the sun set up edgewise. Osiris was a mugwump, and had great political influence. He is dead. Isis, whose photograph was also displayed, was an interesting young lady, both the sister and wife of Osiris. She had the symbol of continued life in her hand, and a youngster in her lap. Her funeral was largely attended. Horus, another god, was little better than a dude. He was born on Christmas. The Egyptians were, for this reason, thoughtless enough to celebrate this day a good many hundred years before Christmas was celebrated by Christians. De mortuis nil nisi bonum. Apis appeared as a bull fat enough for beef. His worshipers spoke highly of him. He went down the dark valley æt. 25. Thoth was the official stenographer in the court of Osiris, and belonged to the literati. His head was that of the ibis. He has laid aside his pen for good. Anubis was the son of Osiris, and acted as conductor for the soul on its passage to the unseen world. He has gone where the good darkies go. Cerberus was a dangerous-looking so-called dog. He had the bodily characteristics of a hippopotamus and the open countenance of a crocodile. He has faded away.

The gods of Greece and Rome were next resurrected—Uranos, the sky, husband of the earth; the Titans, who were strong men; Zeus, or Jupiter, who was the king-pin among the deities; Juno, his consort; Neptune, the ancient mariner; Pluto, the overseer of the infernal regions, whose tropical home makes him an object of envy during the present cold snap; Ceres, a female grain monopolist; Vesta, who builds the fire in the morning that warms the earthly household; Mars, secretary of war and commander of all the military forces of heaven; Vulcan, like Brother John Peck, a learned blacksmith; Hermes, the district telegraph boy, who carried messages for Jupiter, besides being an orator; Aphrodite, or Venus, a very attractiv lady, whose first name, run in with that of Hermes in a Universological way, made Hermaphrodite, after the fashion of unism, duism, and trinism; Bacchus, a bibulous sinner; and others too numerous to mention, who long since laid this burden down.

To these deities, and the legends connected with them, Professor Rawson traced the origin of the Hebrew and Jewish myths and fables. Egypt, he held, was the birthplace of the gods. The Greeks or Romans copied from them, but did not create new deities. They merely improved upon the old ones. They mixed history with mythology to such an extent that it was difficult to separate the gods from the men. The Hebrews did the same thing, as will be seen in many instances in the Old Testament.

The exhibition of pictures, and the subsequent remarks of the professor, occupied the time usually devoted to discussion, and there were no other speakers except Mr. Wakeman, who explained that the subjectiv portion of mythology, in which the forces of nature were recognized and invested with beneficence, was beautiful and commendable. Its objectiv aspect, however, when these forces were represented in wood and stone and worshiped in an idolatrous manner, turned a beautiful idea into a gross superstition. That part of it we should reject, while retaining all there was of the lovable and worshipful.

The club adjourned rather earlier than usual, and the audience went out into the frosty night. Neither Mr. Shook nor Professor Vaughan was present. They were, however, though lost to sight, to memory dear. The next lecture will be delivered by Mrs. E. M. King on "Rational Dress Realized."

The Toronto Convention.

A GREAT SUCCESS—THE UNION WITH THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE CONSUMATED—THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION NOW AND FOREVER!

The Convention of the Freethought Association of Canada has just closed, and it has been, in many respects, a remarkable Convention. The best minds of Canada hav come together and set in motion influences that will in time create vast changes. Under the able and arduous labors of Mr. Watts, a new impulse has been given to the Secular movement, and a union of forces has been brought about which redounds not only to his own credit, but to that of his co-adjutors in Toronto and elsewhere. Seven years ago, the first Convention of the Freethinkers of Canada was held, and an organization begun. Since then, from various causes, there has been no annual meeting; and while Freethought and Secularism hav silently grown in many quarters, there has been apparently no public advancement. Nevertheless, many devoted spirits hav preserved the impetus until, in good time, a new movement has been made which to-day is full of the most glorious promis.

I can only giv a bird's-eye view of the Convention and its general results. A more elaborate and particular account will be given in next week's Truth Seeker, and the work of the Convention will be presented to the Liberals of the country, who are, no doubt, thoroughly interested in this combination of American ideas and forces.

On Saturday afternoon, Dec. 13th, the sessions of the Convention began, and Mr. Evans, the able and popular president of the Freethought Association, was chosen chairman of the Convention, and Mr. Risser, a worker in the field, of rare ability and earnestness, was chosen secretary. Committees were then appointed to report business, and the Convention adjourned its formal proceedings until Monday. On Saturday evening there was an informal reception at the rooms of the Toronto Society, No. 9 Opera House Building. There were greetings and a general talk and understanding of the plans of the future. An address of welcome was made by President Evans, who pointed out the brilliant opportunities of the hour. Mr. Putnam, as representativ of the National League, voiced the common sentiment of all the delegates present by declaring that in the almalgamation of all the Liberals of America, in Canada, and the United States, under the leadership of Robert G. Ingersoll, could be evolved the grandest Freethought organization in the world. After his address, there were songs and short speeches, and a friendly handshake all round.

On Sunday morning a large audience gathered in Albert Hall, and listened to one of Remsburg's masterly lectures. It was a concatenation of solid facts and unanswerable arguments against the position held by the church in regard to the Sabbath. He showed that it was not of divine origin, and if it was, then every Christian was bound to observe Saturday and not Sunday.

He demonstrated that the Sabbath and Sabbath laws were the last entrenchment of ecclesiastical tyranny, and right here we must deal our heaviest blows in the work of destruction. The discourse was delivered in Mr. Remsburg's usually calm but intensely interesting manner, holding the closest attention of his audience and eliciting repeated applause. No man is a more complete master of his subject than Remsburg. He handles it with masterly skill. His array of learning is somewhat astounding, showing the highest class of scholarship and the most arduous research, and the results of his dry study of dusty annals are presented with a rhetorical polish and brightness that charm the unwearied listener.

Mr. Remsburg should be kept constantly at work. He is accomplishing a peculiar and most important mission, as shown by his "False Claims" and "Bible Morals," which are among the most popular—and deservedly so—of our Liberal books. His sustained and noble eloquence gave a vigorous tone to the thought and spirit of the Convention.

In the afternoon, to an audience equally numerous and appreciativ, Mr. Putnam gave his lecture, "The New American Church," in which he outlined the varied work of Secularism in the future, as it brings men together for greater and more consecrated effort.

In the evening the hall was simply overflowing. Every seat was occupied, and many stood up, and, the Toronto Globe said, "scores were turned away, having no chance for admission." Mr. Watts has impressed himself deeply upon the community, as was witnessed by this imposing audience. He lectured upon "Freethought: Its Nature, Struggles, and Triumphs." It was received with marked approval, and in its vigorous peroration depicted the victories which are yet to be won in our great movement.

Mrs. Watts, with her usual vivacity and charming skill, gave a recitation, which was received with unbounded applause. Mr. Watts has indeed a noble co-laborer in his wife, who most thoroughly sympathizes with his ideas, and, while having a wonderful talent for the stage, has also intellectual gifts of no common order, and has a keen interest, not only in the triumphs of art, but in the advancement of truth and humanity.

On Monday the real business of the Convention was accomplished. Without entering into details, which will be given next week by another and more capable hand, I will say that the great work of amalgamation of the Canadian societies with those of the United States was accomplished without a dissenting voice. Thus a noble undertaking, begun and carried on by Charles Watts, seconded by the leading Liberals of Canada, has been brought to a successful issue, and a vast impulse will thus be given the American movement, and the power of Freethought, both in Canada and the United States, be doubled. The consummation of this wise and generous plan shows that the American Secular Union has struck the common heart of the Liberals of this country; that from this time henceforward it will be the representativ body; that those who really desire any organization for freedom and humanity must unite with it, as the central working force of advanced thought, which puts into practical shape the best culture and highest hopes and aspirations of every true-hearted reformer. The American Secular Union has vindicated its universality—that it is not a section, but the whole Liberal element of the continent, so far as organized action is concerned. Those who wish to work in an isolated fashion can do so, and no doubt accomplish good; and there will be some independent societies of value and importance; but the comprehensiv American organization that shall combine the East and West, the North and South, in practical unity, is the American Secular Union. The Cassadaga Convention and the Toronto Convention hav joined hands, and the rainbow of promis shines over all departing discords, and hereafter we shall keep step to the music of the Union; and the "accidents of birth," as Mr. Watts in his admirable speech on the adoption of the resolutions said, "will be forgotten in the grandeur and all-embracing glory of that truth which is so dear to all our hearts." Thousands and thousands of Liberals will say Amen, and Amen, to this generous sentiment.

A greater, grander, more effectiv work for Liberalism has not yet been done. All honor to our Canadian brethren for their swift response to our cordial greeting.

The decisiv business of the Convention was wound up on Monday evening by a brilliant entertainment, both musical and dramatic, in which Mr. and Mrs. Watts shone with undiminished luster, while Toronto displayed its really remarkable home talent, and showed how gloriously the genius of Freethought can touch the heart and make life a beauty as well as a duty.

Among the delights of the occasion was the rendition of some parts of an exquisit opera, words and music by one of our noble Freethought writers, Wm. McDonnell. It shows that even now we can begin to write some of the songs of the future.

After the entertainment there was a dance and a supper, and then happy dreams for those who, like myself, did not partake too freely of the luscious things set before them. I hav learned much by experience.

I want to say more about my Canada friends, but cannot just now, for it is almost time for the mail to close. I am now with my good friend Algie, at Alton, and to-morrow there is to be a dedication of the first Freethought Hall in Canada, and next week I shall tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER about the good time we shall hav, and the good folks I shall meet. I feel as if I had dropped into a paradise of noble spirits, and I want all Liberals to hav a taste of this heaven on earth, and to realize that we are bound, after all our many struggles, to enjoy the golden hours of success.

Dec. 16, 1884.

A NOTABLE GATHERING.—CONSECRATION OF THE FREETHOUGHT HALL IN CANADA, TO LIBERTY, SCIENCE, AND HUMANITY.—ADDRESSES BY WILLIAM ALGIE, PUTNAM, EVANS, M'DONNELL, BOAS, WATTS, AND OTHERS.

William Algie is one of the remarkable men of Canada; a captain of industry, who has achieved wonderful results in a short time, a true leader he is in the great army of nature, knowing how to master her forces, and develop her wealth. A Scottish lad, at the age of seventeen years he left home with five dollars in his pocket, and now at thirty-four he is one of the prominent mill-owners of Canada, with a property of superior value, the accumulation of his own energy and shrewdness. He is a capitalist, but not a monopolist, for he recognizes the rights of labor, and he treats his employees with sympathy, respect, and absolute justice. A few years ago the site where his house now stands was a barren hill, and the stream where the music of his mill is now heard was an undeveloped water-course. Now it is crowned with a noble residence—two in fact, his father's and his own—and on the banks of the stream, whose power has been utilized, is one of the best woollen mills in the Dominion, where manufactures of the first order are made ready for the market. Such is William Algie, a genuin son of the soil, thrifty, independent, progressiv; a soldier of humanity, a pioneer, not simply of the philosophy of Secularism, but of its tremendous practical power.

But the wonder of it is that there is not one Algie, but several. There is a band of brothers and sisters congregated in this mountain land of Canada, all gifted with the best that Scottish blood can confer from a noble ancestry. Besides William, there is Robert and the Doctor and Miss Aggie Algie, who will make a famous company in the mighty army of the Secular Union. But the laws of heredity are vindicated when we look at the source of this admirable array of talent. The father and the mother, Mr. and Mrs. Matthew Algie, two heroic specimens of manhood and womanhood, who, in humble circumstances, hav made worth victorious. Mr. Matthew Algie has been a workingman, and has never received over $1.25 per day for his labor, and yet he has raised a large family, given his children a good education, fitted some of them for the professions, and to-day enjoys an honorable competence. His wife is one of those grand women who, in the character and success of her offspring, wears a crown more to be reverenced than that of any queen.

So we see, as Mr. Boas in his address declared, that this Freethought Hall was not the creation of to-day, but had the roots of its life away back in the past. In distant years, and on another continent, the streams of thought were started that hav crystallized in this firm structure. When Matthew Algie was a youth in Scotland, a devout member of a Presbyterian church, the minister told his congregation one Sunday that Combe's "Constitution of Man" was the most dangerous enemy of Christianity. This aroused the curiosity of one of his listeners, and he read that book, and by reading it became a Freethinker, gave to his children the benefits of a cultivated reason, and from that sprang this instrumentality of science and progress. So each deed has its fruit, and each thought its outcome in all the tides of human advancement.

On Tuesday morning, after the great Toronto Convention, we came with William Algie to this mountain hight, whereon we think a New Zion is to be established much more beautiful than the old.

We came to Alton in the midst of a blinding snow-storm, and old Boreas made our ears ache, but good cheer and a few sparkling jokes made our way bright, and none the worse for wear, we at last found ourselvs at Liberty Hall—a stately residence on the very highest eminence in the neighborhood—where liberty indeed reigns, for therein is a happy home, whose law is love and whose authority is simple justice. We were introduced to Mrs. William Algie, a royal co-laborer with her husband—a Yankee girl, too—and so Canada can't claim all the credit of this charming paradise. We felt at home at once—and why shouldn't we, in the midst of so much generosity and unconventional civilization.

Wednesday was the eventful day, and from many miles old friends came, and leading Secularists of Canada.

The hall stands on the banks of the river, built of stone and sand from neighboring quarries, in possession of Mr. Algie—a pretty structure, capable of holding four hundred people, with a foundation as lasting as the hills, and the winds and the storms cannot prevail against it. It has come from the heart of nature, and has the strength of nature, and is a symbol of the power of humanity over nature—of the new providence that shall make from the rude material the brilliant cosmos.

The opening exercises were held in the afternoon consisting of music and addresses. The first speech was made by Mr. William Algie himself, who stated what the hall was built for: first, for freedom to hav a place where anything that could conduce to the welfare of humanity would hav an opportunity. The hall was open to such merely by paying the cost. Then there were to be held in the hall regular meetings of the Alton Secular Society, and from time to time there would be lectures on various subjects. Also there would be debating societies, night-schools, and evening classes, and in connection with hall a gymnasium and bathing house. The address of Mr. Algie showed what a matter-of-fact individual he is, and though as enthusiastic as a poet, he knows what kind of a world he livs in and what its needs are, and he does not purpose to waste any time in glittering shams; and thoroughly believing that cleanliness is not only next to godliness, but a little ahead; he means to make this Hall of Science a baptism of humanity, that through the body shall make both head and heart nobler and better.

Mr. Putnam, as secretary of the American Secular Union, gave his impressions of the Freethinkers of Canada, which, I think, by this time most of the readers of this paper know. One thing he said, which was pre-eminently true, namely, that the Freethinkers of Canada, as our good friend D. A. Blodgett, of Michigan, says, hav a certain steadiness of character wrought out of the disciplin and difficulties through which they hav passed that will be of incalculable benefit to our more volatil Yankee spirit. There is a depth and intensity of purpose in the Canadian movement that to me was a surprising pleasure. I feel that the whole movement throughout America will receive from our friends over the line an impulse and strength that will make our work much more effectual.

Mr. Malcolm, of Innerkip, followed—one of those very stanch Freethinkers who, plunging into the forests, made for himself a home, and, wrestling with nature, not only reaped her harvests, but found mental independence. He congratulated the Secular Society of Alton that it had built this edifice, not to fulfil the scripture text that man should walk in the old ways, but to meet the wants of to-day, that man should find out and walk in new ways that should make the world happier.

After Mr. Malcolm came our writer and singer, Mr. Wm. McDonnell, author of "Exeter Hall." He was no orator, he said, but in a few words he voiced the promis of the hour, and the kindling hope of every heart.

After him came one of Canada's notable leaders, Mr. Evans, president of the Canadian Secular Union, who added his generous word and presence to the auspicious proceedings. Then Mr. McFedries gave us many a good laugh, mixed with stirring appeals, and prepared us for the beautiful address of Mr. Boas, who touched upon the deeper meanings of the hour. the far influences of ancestry, and fine processes of evolution, by which this crowning hour was produced.

Finally Mr. Watts gathered up the chain of all these seven speeches, and declared the true aims of Secularism with his powerful oratory which, as one of his listeners afterward said, was "like a tempest." It was a brilliant defense and exposition of those principles of which this building was to be a perpetual vindication.

So closed the afternoon's exercises, a feast of reason and flow of soul.

What shall I say of the evening—a concert, a play, and a dance? The hall was crowded, and everybody was happy. The Beaver band gave the orchestral music, which was quite exhilarating, so much so that I felt like dancing myself, but a serious sense of responsibility prevented—at least, until the chairs were taken away. The good friends of Toronto did their level best to grace the occasion. There was the vivacious Charles Hicks, a real genius in the musical line; a Mr. J. Harrison and Professor Strange, who evoked repeated applause and encores by their skill in rendering both comedy and sentiment; and Mr. Edwards added to the pleasure of the occasion; and James Ward created uproarious laughter by his wonderful impersonation of "Simple Simon," and woman completed the triumph in the recitations of Mrs. Charles Watts, who, after giving "The Gauntlet to Men," was compelled by long-continued applause to giv "The Bridge of Sighs," which showed that, sparkling as she is in comedy, she can voice with musical eloquence the deepest pathos of human life and move to tears as well as smiles. And then we had Miss Jessie Harrison, a bright New England lass, whose magnificent playing upon the piano was a glorious and entrancing display of the union of soul between Canada and the states. It did my heart good to know that even Canada, with all its wealth of talent, must blend with it the graces of our own Yankee girls.

However, the drama was rendered altogether by home talent, and we must say that the little village of Alton is by no means lacking in histrionic genius. Mr. Robert Algie was especially successful, and Mr. Charles Hill in the role of comedy, and William Algie as Captain, and "Frisky," were exceedingly amusing, and Miss Aggie was quite striking, and Fred Hill was by no means backward. All went merry as a marriage-bell. Indeed, there were two weddings, and of course no lack of happiness. The villain was killed, there was a big explosion, and then blue sky and flowers.

Then came the dance, and the spirit of joy and swift music closed the eventful day, and in bright and happy memory, as well as with glowing thoughts of the future, stands the Freethought Hall of Alton, or Hall of Science, as it is named over the entrance, where the artistic skill of James Ward, of Galt, has put into blue and gold its unfading emblazonry.

So it stands, the beautiful hall, on the banks of the busy stream, built by the sacrifice of noble men and women. There it shall stand, in storm and sunshine, in the bosom of these mighty hills, speaking the gospel of nature, proclaiming the dignity of humanity. It shall stand covered with the promis of heaven, not for the skies, but for this world, and amid its accumulating associations in the flow of years shall shine the memory of him, the brightest dream of whose life was the completion of this temple of humanity, but whose life passed to death ere it was fulfilled; but his labors hav helped to make this monument, and in the glowing words of Charles Watts, his epitaph shall be: "He did his work, and he did it well." In memoriam it shall be to Matthew Algie, brother of William Algie. The living and the dead shall be blessed in this reward of their unselfish labors. Yours fraternally,

Dec. 18, 1884. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Brief Correspondence.

A. ADLER, Lancaster, Pa., to the chairman of Executiv Committee, C. B. Reynolds: On reading your announcement in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I feel reviving within me intense desire to hav lectures here to animate the scattered and dormant forces of Liberalism in our goodly city of Lancaster, gain additional strength, and finally organize a League. I hav repeatedly tried to accomplish this, but failed, and hav come to the conclusion that nothing can be done here without outside assistance. This assistance, I think, you can render us. I would therefore suggest you write me, naming days—say three—in which it will be convenient for you to be here, and name subject of each lecture, and I will go among the friends and solicit their co-operation, and will then immediately acquaint you with the result.

Bacon and Shakspere.

A CHRONOGRAPHIC PARALLEL.

A. D. 1590.

Bacon at 29 has become the bosom friend of the accomplished and rising Earl of Essex, aged 22. Secretary Walsingham dies April 6th, and some time during the year Essex marries his only daughter, Lady Sidney. Bacon's ardent attachment to Essex continues unabated until the earl's final overt act of treason in 1601. To Essex and his betrothed the "Sonnets" of Shakspere, first published in 1609, eight years after the earl's death, are evidently addressed, in the year 1590.

Shakspere at 26 is still unknown, either as an actor or an author. By this time four or five theaters are in existence in London, and several of the Shakspere plays hav been performed.

A. D. 1591.

Bacon at 30 pursues his studies at Gray's Inn, makes an occasional visit to his mother's country seat at Gorhambury, and spends part of his time in retirement on his half-brother Edward's estate, delightfully situated on the Thames, near Twickenham.

Shakspere at 27 is an under-actor. The "Comedy of Errors," "Love's Labor Lost," and other plays hav been performed, but the only notice of Shakspere up to this time is by Spenser:

"Our pleasant Willie, ah, is dead of late."

Mr. White argues that this could not mean Shakspere. He says the name Willie was not uncommonly used merely to mean a poet, and that "the 'Teares of the Muses' had certainly been written before 1590, when Shakspere could not hav risen to the position assigned by the first poet of the age to the subject of this passage, and probably in 1580, when Shakspere was a boy of 16, in Stratford." But Spenser's poem was first published in 1591, soon after his return from a four years' residence in Ireland, and it is unlikely that his description of "the painted theaters" applied to any earlier time. Furthermore, we hav in the "Sonnets" (135, 136, and 143) a most certain recognition of the poet Will in 1590. The name is thus italicized in the first edition, 1609.

A. D. 1592.

Bacon at 31 has been a member of Parliament seven years, a Bencher five, and a reader three. Yet he is without practice at the bar, and so straitened for money that he has to get help from the Shylocks. His hope of obtaining some remunerativ employment from the state has been deferred six years, and he grows despondent. To his uncle, Lord Treasurer Burleigh, he writes as follows:

"With as much confidence as mine own honest and faithful devotion unto your service and your honorable correspondence unto me and my poor estate [see Sonnet 29] can breed in a man, do I commend myself unto your lordship.

"I wax now somewhat ancient; one and thirty years is a great deal of sand in the hour-glass [Sonnets 2 and 138, Passionate Pilgrim, 1]. My health, I thank God, I find confirmed, and I do not fear that action shall impair it, because I account my ordinary course of study and meditation to be more painful than most parts of action are [Sonnets 27 and 28]. I ever bare a mind (in some middle place that I could discharge) to serve her majesty, not as a man born under Sol, that loveth honor, nor under Jupiter, that loveth business (for the contemplativ planet carrieth me away wholly), but as a man born under an excellent sovereign, that deserveth the dedication of all men's abilities. Besides, I do not find in myself so much self love, but that the greater parts of my thoughts are to deserve well (if I were able) of my friends, and namely of your lordship, who, being the Atlas of this commonwealth, the honor of my house, and the second founder of my poor estate, I am tied by all duties, both of a good patriot and of an unworthy kinsman, and of an obliged servant, to employ whatsoever I am to do you service.

"Again, the meanness of my estate doth somewhat move me [Sonnets 25, 29, and 37], for though I cannot accuse myself that I am either prodigal or slothful [Sonnets 110 and 111], yet my health is not to spend, nor my course to get.

"Lastly, I confess that I hav as vast contemplativ ends as I hav moderate civil ends; for I hav taken all knowledge to be my province, and if I could purge it of two sorts of rovers, whereof the one with frivolous disputations, confutations, and verbosities, the other with blind experiments and auricular traditions and impostures, hath committed so many spoils. I hope I should bring in industrious observations, grounded conclusions, and profitable inventions and discoveries, the best state of that province.

"This, whether it be curiosity, or vain glory, or nature, or (if one take it favorably) philanthropia, is so fixed in my mind as it cannot be removed. . . . And if your lordship will not carry me on, I will not do as Anaxagoras did, who reduced himself with contemplation unto voluntary poverty, but this I will do: I will sell the inheritance that I hav, and purchase some lease of quick revenue, or some office of gain that shall be executed by a deputy, and so giv over all care of service, and become a sorry book-maker or a true pioneer in that mine of truth which (he said) lay so deep.

"This which I hav writ unto your lordship is rather thoughts than words, being set down without all art, disguising, or reservation. . . . From my lodging at Gray's Inn.

Early in this year Bacon's elder brother Anthony returns from France after an absence of ten years, crippled with the gout. The two brothers liv together at Gray's Inn on the most affectionate and confidential footing. Numerous letters from their mother at this time are found among Anthony's papers. She writes Latin and Greek like a college professor, and is an adept in Puritan theology. She can hardly say whether her son's gout, or his association with a suspected Catholic, "were the worse tidings." She trusts that Anthony uses "prayer twice a day," and fears that Francis "is too negligent herein."

Essex is aspiring to distinction and Bacon is studying to help him. Fanciful pageants, or so-called "Devices," are the fashion of the times, gotten up for the entertainment of the queen on festiv occasions. One of Bacon's most notable smaller works composed for such an occasion during this year is a "Discourse in Praise of his Sovereign." Though a rhetorical essay, it has a double purpose. An anonymous attack has been made upon the queen and her advisers, written by a Catholic, and the "Discourse" meets and answers the principal allegations. Later in the same year Bacon embodies the substance of the same oration in a paper entitled "Observation on a Libel published this present year 1592," which is extensivly circulated in manuscript.

As early as 1592, through the interest of Essex, Bacon has the honor of a visit from the queen at his retired lodge near Twickenham, on his half-brother Edward's estate, and he presents her with a sonnet in compliment to that "generous nobleman." Here, also, in after years, the queen honors him with her presence on various occasions, and frequent opportunities occur of addressing other sonnets to his sovereign mistress's eyebrow, though professing "not to be a poet" (Nicl ols's Prog. of Q. Eliz. iii, 190; Holmes's Auth. of Shak., 85).

In the beginning of the next reign the examination of Thomas Phillips discloses the fact that in this year, 1592, there was some important secret correspondence between Spain, Scotland, and the pope, and that with this correspondence "there were acquainted the queen's majesty, the Earl of Essex, Mr. Francis Bacon, Sir William Waad, and Mr. Phillips; the three last being acquainted with it, every man in his turn, as the queen and the earl would employ them" (Spedding's Bacon, 1878, i, 65).

Shakspere at 28 is noticed by the dissipated Robert Green in a pamphlet written shortly before his death:

"There is an upstart crow beautified with our feathers that with his Tygres heart, wrapt in player's hide, supposes hee is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you; and being an absolute Johannes factotum, is, in his owne conceyt, the only Shake-scene in a countrey."

It does not appear that Green recognized Shakspere as a writer of plays; he does not say "write out blank verse," as Mr. White infers, but "bombast" it out; and he further describes him as one of "those puppets that speak from our mouths those Antics garnished in our colors."

The "Tygres heart wrapt in a player's hide," is a parody on a line in the "Third part of Henry VI." (Act 1, sc. iv).

"O tiger's heart, wrapp'd in a woman's hide!"

This is one of the earliest plays; Malone believes it was written before 1590, but not by Shakspere, who nevertheless, he thinks, adopted, retouched, and amplified it. But it is not pretended that he changed that line.

John Sphakspere is presented as a recusant "for not coming to church for feare of process for debt."

A.D. 1593.

Bacon at 32 is the legal adviser of Essex, who also employs Anthony as secretary. Essex, Southampton, and other young lords and courtiers, frequent the theaters. Lady Bacon would hav been horrified to know that her sons went to such ungodly places.

Bacon makes his celebrated speech on the Subsidy, March 7th, which defeats Lord Burleigh and offends the queen. He writes a letter in his own defense to Burleigh. It is more of a justification than an apology, and the queen forbids him to come into her presence. He then writes a most despondent letter to Essex, March 30th, in which he says:

"I cannot but conclude with myself that no man ever received [or read] a more exquisit disgrace. And therefore truly, my lord, I was determined and am determined, if her majesty reject me, this to do. My nature can take no evil ply; but I will by God's assistance, with this disgrace of my fortune, and yet with that comfort of the good opinion of so many honorable and worthy persons, retire myself with a couple of men to Cambridge, and there spend my life in my studies and contemplations, without looking back. I humbly pray your lordship to pardon me for troubling you with my melancholy."

Compare the above with the "Sonnets," in which the writer describes, in the very words we hav italicized, his despondent state three years before. For example: "When in disgrace with fortune." "Trouble deaf heaven." "Oppressed with melancholy"—("Sonnets," 29, 45).

Bacon's creditors become importunate, and he despairs of preferment. Not liking the profession of the law, he resolves, it possible, to convert his patrimony into an annuity. This cannot be done without the surrender of his mother's interest. Anthony, who is always ready to further his brother's wishes and plans, urges his mother to consent. Lady Bacon loves her sons, and is willing to aid them. But knowing that Francis is an over-trustful and over-indulgent master (which, indeed, was one of his principal weaknesses), she says, "I will not hav his cormorant seducers and instruments of Satan to him committing foul sin by his countenance to the displeasing of God and his true godly fear." She will consent to the arrangement only on condition that she is made manager of her son's finances. Such a condition of relief cannot, of course, be accepted by one who aspires to be the queen's attorney.

Essex would naturally dissuade him from the resolution to retire and become a sorry book-maker, and probably did dissuade him, for straightway we find Bacon seeking the favorable influence of Lord Burleigh through his two sons, Sir Thomas and Sir Robert Cecil. The latter advises him that his best chance of regaining access at court is through Essex, and as early as April 16th Essex has twice earnestly besought the queen on Bacon's behalf. A month later Bacon ventures to write to the queen, hoping to remove her displeasure; on the 2d of June Essex informs him that she is "thoroughly appeased" and he hopes soon to overcome her sole (?) objection to his preferment, namely, his years. The earl "had every motiv," says Mr. Spedding, "for wishing his friend in the higher office. He really believed him to be the fitter man, and he knew him to be affectionately attached to himself."

Essex is now privy councilor, and has correspondents in France and Scotland. Anthony serves him in the capacity of an under-secretary of state, receiving all letters, which are mostly in cipher, and forwarding them (generally through his brother Francis) to the earl, deciphered, and accompanied with their joint suggestions. The three thus form a kind of small Foreign Office, and before the end of the year "all matters of intelligence" are reported to be "wholly in the earl's hands" (Spedding's "Bacon," I., 113).

But by the 24th of August Essex finds that the queen is not "thoroughly appeased" toward Bacon, who, she says, is more in fault than any of Parliament, and for a much less offense would hav been banished forever by her father. Her humor is to delay his near access to her, and yet she would not "lose the use of the ablest gentleman to do her service of any quality whatsoever" (Ibid, 115).

Shakspere at 29 is only an under-actor, nor does he ever, so far as we know, take any higher part than such as old Adam in "As You Like It," and the ghost in "Hamlet." At least nine of the Shakspere plays hav been performed up to 1593, but with no one appearing to claim their authorship. But now appears a published poem, "Venus and Adonis," with a dedication by "William Shakespeare" to the earl of Southampton, aged 20. And soon after it is said that the wealthy earl has given to the actor £1,000 to enable him to purchase a share in the Globe Theater, which is built in the following year.

Mr. White has no doubt that there was a genuin friendship between the earl and the actor, in spite of their difference of rank. What evidence of it is there, aside from the dedication of this and a subsequent poem? Is not the style of the two dedications truly Baconian, and are not the relations between Bacon and Southampton truly expressed in both? As to the first poem, the writer, doubtless truthfully, said, "It is the first heir of my invention." It was perhaps a very early composition; but he had written a more creditable poem three years before, and covertly addressed it to another more precious and beloved friend.

ANTIQUARY.

Colonel Ingersoll Interviewed.

From the Pittsburgh Post.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll took breakfast at the Union Depot yesterday morning, on his way to Washington from the West. When approached by a Post representativ, he said:

"Hav you your conundrums written out?"

The colonel believes that reporters are as liable to make mistakes as he alleges Moses was when he wrote the Pentateuch. To avoid errors he compels the interviewer to write out the questions, and he answers in writing underneath. The reporter wrote on the back of an envelope:

"What changes will Cleveland make in the departmental positions?"

The colonel read it, and wrote the following in Paysonian script on the back of a bill of fare:

"He will investigate the national edifice from the peak of the ridge pole to the floor of the coal cellar. He will rout the army of sinecures that hav been holding the parlor floors, and letting the actual workers roost in the attic. Whether he finds the former few or many, that will be the extent of the change."

"Do you think Blaine will be a candidate in 1888?" wrote the reporter on what was left of the envelope.

The bill of fare again came back adorned as follows:

"It looks as though he was trimming his sails for any favorable breeze that might spring up about that period. Time enough has not elapsed since the election to determin whether Blaine, when crushed to earth, can rise again. He will not show his hand until the new administration assumes a line of definit action."

The Ancient Tunnel in Samos.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In an item recently copied by The Truth Seeker from a "Sunbeam," it was stated that a tunnel measuring about 5,000 feet long, and constructed at least nine centuries B.C., had just been discovered by the governor of the island of Samos; that the tunnel was mentioned by Herodotus; and that it served for the supply of drinking water.

When I read the item in the Sun I immediately wrote a brief note saying that the aforesaid tunnel was discovered some time ago by a Frenchman named Guerin, who cleared out the sand and stones to the distance of about 1,600 feet. This is stated in a note to Rawlinson's Herodotus, 1872, vol. ii, p. 377.

The Sun did not print my communication.

Historic Christianity.

From the National Reformer.

I am glad to see that Mr. Forder is taking up the question as to whether Jesus "the Christ" is a historical personage. Some time since, I examined the evidence as fully as I was able, and was thoroughly convinced, against my will, that John the Baptist, Christ, and the twelve Apostles, were entirely fictitious characters; they never existed, even as simple reformers. I do not expect others to accept this on my word, even though I am, like the gospel writers, wholly unknown, for, unlike them, I am putting my name to this "scripture," and so disproving my infallibility. Perhaps the following items of Jewish history, taken chiefly from Josephus, may enable your readers to judge for themselvs. For convenience of reference, I hav placed the name of the reigning emperor over the incidents which occurred under his rule, and hav added the dates of accession and death.

AUGUSTUS. FROM 19 B.C. TO A.D. 14.

Herod the Great died in March, 4 B.C. (soon after the birth of Christ, according to Matthew i and ii), and was succeeded by his sons Archelaus and Herod Antipas.

Archelaus was soon reduced to ethnarch, or nativ magistrate, of half the kingdom. Ten years later he was banished to Gaul by the emperor, and his district was handed over (A.D. 7) to Cyrenius, governor of Syria. Then came the taxation of all Syria. (It is not true that all the world was taxed, as Luke has it.) Judas of Galilee, alias Judas the Gaulonite, with Sadoc, a Pharisee, rebelled against the taxation and proclaimed the kingdom of God, refusing to serve any earthly king. There was great fighting. (This is the time Christ was born, according to Luke ii, some thirteen years after he was born according to Matthew.)

14. TIBERIUS. 33.

Pilate, procurator of Judea. A man led people to Mount Gerism, saying that Moses had left the holy dishes hidden there. Pilate, thinking they were up to some mischief, attacked the crowd and killed the prophet and many of his followers. The Samaritans complained to Vitellus, who put Marcellus in Pilate's place and sent him to Rome. When he arrived there Tiberius was dead.

Herod Antipas, who had been in power since 4 B.C., about this time married Herodias, and Aretas, the father of his other wife, not liking to hav his daughter turned out, sent an army against Herod, and dispersed his force. Herod wrote to the Emperor Tiberius, giving his version of the affair. Tiberius then sent orders to Vitellus to attack Aretas and kill him. Before he could do this, he heard at Jerusalem that Tiberius was dead.

[If Pilate was sent out of the country at the same time that Herod married Herodias (and killed the Baptist for complaining of the marriage, according to the gospels), how could he (Pilate) crucify Christ three years after, according to Henry Ward Beecher and others?]

33. CALIGULA. 41.

38. Josephus was born. Herod Antipas was banished to Gaul.

41. CAIUS OR CLAUDIUS. 54.

Cuspius Fadus, procurator of Judea. In his time another impostor, called Theudas, appeared. (Acts v, 36, blunders by putting his messianic disturbance before that of Judas of Galilee, A.D. 7!)

Felix, procurator. Impostors lured people into the wilderness. One of them came out of Egypt ("out of Egypt hav I called my son"), and said he would call from the Mount of Olives, and the walls of Jerusalem would fall down. Felix killed many of his followers, and the pretender disappeared.

Still there was rioting and incendiarism by the followers of the impostors.

54. NERO. 68.

Festus, procurator of Judea. An impostor lured people into the wilderness. He was killed with many of his followers. (Ant. xx, 8–10.)

Albinus, procurator. About the year 63, Jesus, the son of Sapphias, was a leader of robbers about Tiberias. With his two friends, John and Simon, he conspired against Josephus, who was then keeping order for the Romans. He was, however, betrayed to Josephus and forsaken by his men. Josephus let him go, but kept 70 of his men as hostages. These men were poor people, and fishermen of Galilee. This Jesus tried to carry out by the sword the tenets of Judas of Galilee, who had appeared in the time of Cyrenius.

About the same time (A.D. 63) a man appeared at the feast of Tabernacles who was possessed by a "divine fury." He wandered about crying "Woe unto Jeruralem," and continued his wail for seven years and five months. The Sanhedrim arrested him as a public nuisance, and scourged him to make him leave off, but he would not do so.

68. GALBA. 68.

68. OTHO. 68.

69. VITELLIUS. 69.

69. VESPASIAN. 79.

At last, at the seige of Jerusalem, this "meek and lowly Jesus" was killed by a stone. Just before the stone hit him (perhaps when he saw it coming) he called out, "And woe unto me also."

79. TITUS. 81.

81. DOMITIAN. 96.

93. Josephus wrote his "Antiquities of the Jews." [His parents and other relations lived at Jerusalem through the crucifixion period, yet he, in his long and invaluable history, never mentions either John the Baptist or Christ. Indeed he denies their existence by saying "these," i. e., the Pharisees, Saducees, Essenes, and the followers of Judas of Galilee, "are the sects of Jewish philosophy." It is true that short paragraphs are now to be found in his history, referring to Christ and John the Baptist, as well as to James, the brother of the Lord, but those referring to Christ are acknowledged by Christians to be Christian forgeries, though they are left in to deceive the unwary; whilst those referring to the Baptist, etc., are equally forgeries inserted by men who could not do without his history, yet were horrified to find that he, like all other historians of the period, was silent regarding their myths.]

96. NERVA.

98. TRAJAN associated.

117. HADRIAN. 138.

Bar Coceb was the last of the messiahs, and was accepted by the Jews as a deliverer. The result of his endeavors to throw off the Roman yoke was that Palestine became a wilderness, and remains so until this day.

Thus we see that Cnrist, who had two sets of ancestors on the male side (for Joseph had two fathers, Jacob and Heli, see Matt. i, 16, and Luke iii, 23), and who had no father, was not only as old as his father (Athanasius), but was born without a mother before the worlds were made (Arius), and was also born twice in Palestine, with an interval of about thirteen years. ("Ye must be born again.") He was crucified four times, once when he was very young (see Clement of Alexandria), once when about thirty-one years of age (Justin Martyr, Henry Ward Beecher, etc.), again when he was thirty-three (according to the orthodox of to-day), and yet again when he was over fifty years of age (Irenæus). Perhaps this was the time he was crucified in Egypt (Rev. xi, 8). Then we are told that he was slain and hung on a tree (Acts v, 30). Yet at the time he is generally supposed to hav suffered at Jerusalem, Pontius Pilate was not in that part of the world at all. The Gospel of Barnabas says that Judas Iscariot was crucified in his stead, but Justin says Judas was crushed to death by a chariot. Will this last account for his falling headlong and his bowels gushing out (Acts i, 18), or for his hanging himself (Matt. xxvii., 5)? Altogether it would be difficult to find anywhere a fairy tale more difficult to swallow. Yet we are told that "he that believeth not shall be damned."

Several of the ancient Christian sects believed that Christ had no real body, and I think they were not far wrong, for, if he had been anything more than "pneuma," his contemporaries would hav told us of the great deeds which "were noised abroad through all the land of Judæa." As Mrs. Besant says, all these marvelous events "left no ripple on the current of contemporary history." Why? Because they never took place. Between Judas the Gaulonite and Bar Coceb appeared some fifty "False Christs," most of them about the time of the siege of Jerusalem. Yet none of them tried to pass themselvs off as Jesus the Christ come back again, as they would hav done if a reformer of that name had promised to return before the last day.

We see, then, that there was no lack of germs ready to swell out into full-grown fairy tales like the one which has come down to us from an age perhaps more full of credulity, miraculous ignorance, and pious fraud, than even our own.

If, then, there was no crucifixion, it is surely a great mistake for Freethinkers to admit the myth as historical; it only helps to bolster up what Harriet Martineau rightly named "the last of the mythologies."

Liberal Funerals.

The subject of "Liberal Funerals" is occasionally discussed through the columns of The Truth Seeker and also others of our Liberal papers, and I hope the agitation will continue until there is a revolution in the manner of conducting funerals. To me there is nothing more inconsistent than to see a Liberal, one who is of us, who, no sooner than death steals a loved one from the family circle, will send right off for an "orthodox" minister to come and perform the last sad duties over the remains, and, as is so often the case, disgrace the living and insult the memory of the dead. Such Liberals only help to hold back the cause we love, and it is a mistake for them to suppose that their Christian friends love and respect them more for such action. If our Freethought principles are worth living for, and good enough to liv by, they are good enough to die by, is my motto, and shall be until reason is dethroned. I know what it is to mourn (as you do, Mr. Editor,) and if there is anything that will take the sunshine from a young and happy manhood, beauty and fragrance from the flowers, and change the whole aspect of nature and and of life, 'tis when love's golden chain is severed by the hand of death. Our Christian friends tell us that "God's ways are not our ways," and that "he has robbed my home of its treasure" that I may "come to Jesus and be saved." I tell them that may be God-like, that may be Christianity, but it is not Humanity; and if there be a God, he can punish me if he will, but he cannot, on such conditions, make me love him. More than this, I tell them their heaven would hav no joy for me, when, according to their plan, she whom I hav loved has been sent the other way, for goodness I consider as no essential part of Christianity. "Salvation by faith," "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," is their great panacea. They place faith above reason. I cannot accept it; it misleads and deludes, and Jesus of whom they preach, as I believe, eludes them in the end. "He has been too long dead." No flowers bloom there for me. From out his cold and pulseless heart no love-lit fires do I see ascending, like those glowing in Humanity's breast.

I hav said, "It is a mistake for Liberals to suppose that Christians will think more of them for burying their dead after the orthodox rule." Now, so far as my observation and knowledge extend, this is the case, as there has been a number of Liberal funerals about here, and our Christian friends say: "We will giv you credit for being consistent; if you really believe what you profess to, we like to see you carry it out." I tell you, "the times that try men's souls" are not yet over. Liberals must rise above the fear of orthodox Christians, or their manish god, and dare to be themselvs.

Some Liberals giv as an excuse for employing an orthodox minister at funerals that the Liberal speakers are out of reach and cannot be procured in time. This may be true; yet I venture to affirm there is scarcely a village or neighborhood of intelligent, thinking people but what contains some friend and lover of humanity who, if requested to, would offer a few words of sympathy, drop a few tears and a few flowers over a departed friend, and in this way help make respectable the cause which needs the support of every true friend of progress and reform. I know it is hard making an innovation on old-established customs, but when once started in the right, we will find, as has been said before, that "the clergy are the most useless class of people in this country," and that we can get along without them.

'Tis not that I am anxious to hav funerals take place, by any means, that I write these lines; but when such times come, as come they will, I want the Liberals to see to it that their friends are represented in sentiment. Do not, I implore you, be frightened by the false plea of "respect for others." Let us respect ourselvs, and by so doing, it seems to me, we cannot better respect others.

Of course the clergy will cry out against us, and will do, and are doing, all in their power to hold back the tide of knowledge and free inquiry.

"But they cannot dam the current,
It is sweeping on to-day,
Carrying truth and reason onward,
Letting creed and dogma stay."

A. H. Thurston.

Burr Oak, Mich., Nov. 23, 1884.

The Christian Socialist for December givs the following extract from "Ouida," which may serve as a commentary on the fetes and bazars at which princes and princesses disport themselvs: "You profess to follow Christ. How hav you the poor with you? The back of their garret, the roof of their hovel, touches the wall of your palace, and the wall is thick. You hav dissipations that you call charities; you hav a tombola for a famin, you hav a dramatic performance for a flood, you hav a fancy fair for a leprosy. Do you never think how terrible it is, that mockery of woe? Do you ever wonder at revolutions? Why do you not say honestly that you care nothing? You do care nothing. The poor might forgiv the avowal of indifference; they will never forgiv the insult of affected pity."

A Methodist Squints toward a New Inquisition.

There was a time in the life of Christianity when unity of belief was enforced by fire and rack. That was when Rome ruled supreme. The Reformation did not wholly do away with this Christian custom. The Reformers also used fire and sword to impress their creed upon doubters. But the tendency of Protestantism is toward larger individual liberty of opinion, because the heretics hav been busily engaged in pushing the pendulum from the verge of the popish arc to the other extreme. A writer in the official organ of the Methodist church now rises to deplore this, and urges that the pendulum has been swung too far. Imperious Rome, he says, must now allow liberty. Religious toleration prevails, and, he alleges, good-will abounds between Protestant sects. In proof of this he cites that at the close of the Christian Workers' Convention, held some years since in Brooklyn, there was general hand-clasping as "Say, brothers, will you meet me?" was sung. Dr. Cuyler says he saw one of Dr. Storrs's deacons and a Quaker and a Methodist standing with clasped hands, and flanked by a Baptist and a Presbyterian.

To further show how the most demoralizing toleration prevails, the writer instances six more occurrences. The first is that when Dr. Rexford, "a Universalist, was to be installed in San Francisco, some years since, prayers were offered by a Unitarian and Presbyterian; scripture was read by a Jewish rabbi; the sermon was preached by a Congregationalist. 2d. A Methodist bishop was lately invited to be present at the dedication of a synagog, or at least to telegraph congratulations. 3d. The trustees of a Methodist Episcopal church hav repeatedly allowed a Unitarian conference to occupy their auditorium. 4th. On a recent Easter, an Episcopalian congregation, temporarily worshiping in a synagog in New York city, celebrated there the Lord's resurrection. 5th. We cannot but mention incidentally a curious analogy. In Japan the leaders of two opposit heathen faiths hav clubbed together to publish a periodical which they call The Two Religion Magazine. 6th. But the ultima Thule was reached by the Unitarian conference in New York city in 1868, when, by formal and unanimous vote, it swept away 'all creeds and forms of doctrin, and welcomed all forms of unbelief as well as belief to their fellowship and work.'"

The tendency indicated by these circumstances is, the writer thinks, alarming. This loosening of denominational ties he is afraid will convert Christianity into what Emerson calls "a mush of concession." It will also fulfil the prophecy of Hawthorne, and put "Protestantism in need of a new apostle to convert it into something positiv." It is a "latitudinarian tendency" which is expressed in the sentiment, "It matters not what a man believes so he is sincere." This sentiment he denounces, and declares that it "ought to hav a quick and flat denial. It has done harm enough already. Evangelical pulpits, platforms, Sunday-schools, literature, conversation, ought to ring out a sharp disavowal. The fallacy is easily exposed. It is the substitution of sincerity for truth. It would make Saul of Tarsus as good as Paul the Apostle in spite of his protest. It esteems faith an unimportant matter, while the Bible pictures it as the sublimest act of the soul, and the want of it a crime. Again, the vaunted 'rightness of life,' which is a substitute for a correct 'mode of faith,' is only morality. It is only part of what is 'required of man.' Spirituality is greater than morality, for it includes it, and to the spiritually-minded alone life and peace are promised."

There is a bigotry about this writer that would be amusing were he not in deadly earnest, and were not the Methodist church a powerful body and so very likely in its conservatism to ally itself with the Catholic church, once its most hated enemy, but now spoken of by it with respect. The feeling "that it is a matter of indifference to what church one belongs," he says, is succeeded by the feeling that "it is of no consequence if one is out of the church altogether." He wants to see the denominational ties tightened, and the members instructed in the history of the "worthies" of the sect, and with "their sectarian achievements." And he further desires the trinitarians to imitate the positivness of Dr. Priestley, when he exclaimed: "I do not wonder that you Calvinists entertain and express a strongly unfavorable opinion of us Unitarians. The truth is, there neither can nor ought to be any compromise between us. If you are right, we are not Christians at all; and if we are right, you are gross idolaters."

There is a moral to all this. Its writing at this time is significant; its publication in the official organ is a sign that there are those high in the church who agree with the writer. In the coming smash-up of Protestantism will these retrogressionists be able to take the Methodist body back to the "good old days" when the Wesleyans asserted that those who disbelieved in witchcraft discredited the scriptures; when Quakers were whipped at carts' ends—the ministers standing by the while, and then preaching a series of sermons beginning with the goodness of God, and closing, as this writer says, "in the one hundred and seventy-first discourse," with the happiness of the saved in heaven? It certainly looks as though they would try.

Was there a Historical Jesus?

We reprint from the National Reformer an able article on their question of Jesus's historic appearance in this vale of tears. Mr. Irving, the writer, concludes that while there were almost innumerable false messiahs, there could hav been no real Christ. We are moved to print this at this time by receiving a paper containing a portion of a sermon by the Rev. T. B. Furbish, of Detroit. Mr. Furbish presents what evidence he knows of for and against his savior, and concludes, as every good minister is bound to do, that there was a historic Jesus. But the evidence he givs makes the conclusion arrived at so ridiculous that it is at once apparent that it is a bread-and-butter decision and not a judicial one. This reason is, "I believe," and his reasons for believing are:

> "The gospel history must somehow hav had an origin. It is not possible to suppose Paul was deceived. No deceiver ever wrote such tremendously earnest letters, or died for lies. Paul was the most egregious humbug unless there was a Jesus behind. It has been said that it would take a Jesus to imagin a Jesus. Be that as it may, Jesus is a historic person, and his teachings hav echoed down the centuries and changed half the world. A man who could so influence the world must be one in whose ears rang the celestial music. There was a historic Jesus."

What reasons! The gospel must somehow hav an origin! no deceiver (not even Joe Smith?) could hav written such earnest letters as Paul; ergo, Paul was no deceiver; and, because he was not a deceiver, Jesus existed! What reasons, and what reasoning! And this after he had given the per contra view. What a set of babes and dolts he must hav taken hav taken his congregation to be! Such drivel after this evidential epitome:

"What," he asks, "do we know of the man Jesus?" And he answers: "Very little, indeed. We hav some sketches. These cannot be relied on as correct. History, as history, knows next to nothing of Jesus. There is no image, no picture, no trace of him outside the New Testament. Josephus is supposed to make mention of him on two different occasions. One of these mentions attributed to Josephus has long since been proven spurious. Of the other there are grave doubts entertained of its authenticity. Tacitus and other writers of that period make merest mention of him. How marvelous that those who were wont to write of everything of importance should fail to record this prodigious event! In the New Testament there is nothing of historic value with the exceptions of the writing of Saul of Tarsus. He is the chief of Christian writers, yet what does he tell us of Jesus? What he tells ought to be relied on, but it is very little. Of the human life of Jesus he barely speaks, but his ideal of Jesus was of a grander and more sublime type. It was so much an ideal that the human life and its relationships drop out of sight.

"The authenticity of the writings ascribed to Peter James, and John are very doubtful. From their contents it is more than probable that they were written at least seventy-five years after the death of Jesus. The whole mass of epistolary writings are wonderfully bare of a historic Jesus. What exists is meager and only of the idealistic kind that has driven the man out of sight, as has been the case for the following eighteen centuries

"We cannot accept the gospel as historic proof. No anonymous writings can be accepted as such. They are the work of men probably two centuries later than Christ's time. Ecclesiastical tradition is not historic certainty. There is no certain historic proof of their existence in the present shape until the middle of the second century. The internal proofs of the gospels themselvs also point strongly to that period."

Yet there was a historic Jesus! And still the wonder grows that a man balancing the pros and cons, and finding the scales sink down in this way, can yet assert that the heavenward-going scale contains the weightier matter. Such a man could even find in Mr. Irving's article further reason for believing in a historic Jesus.

Mr. Heber Newton, Infidel.

"I suppose you hav heard that Heber Newton has begun again with those shameful assaults of his on the Pentateuch?"

"Yes, and I suppose the poor dear bishop will hav to let him go on and daren't say a word or do anything to stop him. I tell you, my dear Mr. Loosely, there is no such thing as true religious liberty in this country while a bishop's hands are tied up in such a perfectly absurd way!"

The foregoing imaginary conversation from Puck exhibits the "state of mind" of the preachers of this city over Mr. Newton's most recent onset upon the alleged holy books. Mr. Newton's sermon, two weeks ago, was upon the "Messianic Superstition," in which he took the Rationalistic ground that the Jewish idea of a Messiah was but a dream of political power—the looked-for coming of a man who should redeem the Jews from the thraldom of the Romans. A political, and not a religious, reformer was expected. "The traditional doctrin of Christ's second advent was in the air, waiting to crystallize around Jesus. He was received at first by his followers as the Hebrew Messiah. They were ever expecting him to set up the throne of a political Messiah. His death, which for a while broke the spell of his power, was thought by them to be the carrying out of the popular belief of Israel. He would then come shortly. He might come any day, at any hour. This was the inspiring belief of the early Christians. But it was essentially the Jewish dream of Utopia."

About a year ago Mr. Newton preached sermons in which were sentiments similar to these, and the Rev. Dr. Buel, the Rev. Dr. DeCosta, and the Rev. Dr. Randolph McKim, fellow Episcopalians, made a formal complaint to Bishop Potter that the sermons were heretical according to the faith of the church to which they all belonged. Bishop Potter asked Mr. Newton to keep his heresy a little quiet. The bishop thought he could disciplin Mr. Newton if he would, but he did not want to raise hard feelings, because the church would suffer, and wouldn't Mr. Newton be so kind as to spare the bishop the trouble? Asked in this gentle manner, Mr. Newton would and did. Now that he has resumed his heretical lectures, his orthodox brethren are again grieved in spirit, but their experience of last winter makes them hopeless of getting Mr. Newton tried by his church. When Dr. Buel was asked the other day if he had read the published abstract of Mr. Newton's Sunday sermon on the "Messianic Superstition," he replied that he had. "Is there anything in it to call for action by the church?" "You had better ask the bishop about that. I won't do anything more about it. Mr. Newton is evidently going off into broad Infidelity. He is becoming an Infidel, according to the teachings of our church, but it is not now my duty to take any steps." The Rev. Mr. McKim said he had read the abstract of the sermon, but he had heard of the proposition to prosecute Mr. Newton. He thought such a step was not likely to be taken under the circumstances.

So much, at least, has been gained in the Episcopal church of this city. A man can speak his honest thoughts and not be burnt, or even tried, for heresy. Who shall say the world is not moving?

Immorality of Catholic Priests in Canada.

The Canadian priests are following the bad example set by the Italian clerics. The province of Quebec is known as the paradise of priests, and some startling revelations are being made as to what that paradise consists of. A dispatch from Montreal itemizes a few particulars.

A short time ago the preacher at the bishop's cathedral was removed from the pulpit in a helpless state of intoxication, and a few days later made a further exhibition of himself in the most fashionable street in the city. This young priest, who is a son of one of the most respected judges in the country, has since been banished to a monastery in France.

No sooner had the scandal in this case abated than the parish priest of Varennes, a pretty little village on the St. Lawrence a short distance from Montreal, was brought into court by a prominent citizen of the place, who charged his father confessor with estranging the affections of his wife, and with other sins considered by the church as mortal. A criminal action was instituted, but political influence was brought to bear upon the magistrate, and he refused to issue the warrant, and the husband is therefore compelled to seek redress before the civil courts. A little later the Catholics of the province were scandalized by the arrest of Father Toupin, the parish priest of Antoine Abbey, who is charged with desecrating the confessional and with other offenses unfit for publication. In addition to these cases several instances hav recently occurred which are opening the eyes of the educated Catholics of the province to the fact that the management of the asylums and other institutions conducted by the Sisters of Mercy is not just what it should be. The startling fact that a sane woman can be confined in a lunatic asylum for three years to gratify the vengeance of an unfaithful husband, as proved by the recent trial of Mrs. Lyman, has also had the effect of arousing the public mind to the dangers attending institutions conducted by nuns, with no proper system of government or medical inspection. Further astounding revelations are promised concerning the management of the now famous Longue Pointe Asylum.

While condemning the men who are guilty of these crimes, the people should not forget to condemn the system of religion which makes such long concealment possible. When once strongly established in a country, Catholicism resolves itself into license for its leaders, and their nunneries and asylums are cloaks that hide the grossest licentiousness and the most cruel crimes. The confessional is a scheme that makes the ruin of women easy, besides giving the priest a hold on his superstitious victim that generally shields him from punishment. The true remedy for all this beastliness is the education of the people above their religion. Then there will be no meat for the bloated vultures to feed upon.

Is This True?

The New York Sun says that a movement is on foot in Chicago to prosecute for blasphemy the speakers at a recent Freethought meeting. The test case, it says, is likely to be made of the orator who called in question the goodness of "God." The words are given: "When I was a boy," he said, "my mother taught me to say, 'Our Father who art in heaven;' and, so far as I know, he has never left there."

We can hardly believe that Christians stupid enough to lay a prosecution on that charge can be found in any city. Unless they get one of their own number upon the bench, the case would be thrown out of court.

But what a multitude of blasphemers a conviction upon such an indictment would make!

Editorial Notes.

In Chicago, every Thursday, in the county court, people alleged to be insane are brought for trial before a jury of six, as required by law. Of six examined recently, three proved to hav been crazed by religious excitement.

A Young Men's Christian Association paper, the Watchman, records that "one town in Illinois, with a population containing three thousand young men, on a recent Sunday had, by actual count, one hundred and forty young men in attendence at the Protestant churches in the morning, and one hundred and sixty-one in the evening. On the previous evening, one hundred and five young men entered a single saloon in this city in only one hour, and there were thirty-six more saloons open at the same time." This state of affairs moves the Chicago Express to remark that "we hav said before, and we say again, that if the church was what it professes to be, such a condition of society as is indicated by the above could not be. The church has lost the respect and confidence of the youth of the country, because it deserves to lose it; because it has become an asylum for the respectable criminal class; the gamblers in grain and stocks, the extorters of usury, the oppressors of the poor."

At present the Index is living upon the vinegar of quoted criticism, which it mixes to the consistency of mud with its own innuendoes. Why in the name of common sense can it not buckle down to its own peculiar task of never saying anything to displease the preachers, and let other people alone to do their work? The world is wide, and no one would ever stumble upon the Index if it did not obtrude itself upon their notice.

The pope is losing his grip on Western Europe. He has published a pontifical letter against divorce, hoping to stem the current of opinion which is setting in favor of divorce in Italy, but the press and people ridicule his efforts. France has established liberal divorce laws, and the Italian parliament is considering a most sensible bill of the same nature. The pope is too late with his semi-bull. He is living in the nineteenth, not the fifteenth, century.

The breaking-up process in Protestant theology is still going on. At a Baptist ministers' weekly conference in this city, a few days since, one of them contended that "it was not a person's belief in all the dogmas of any system of theology which should be made the test of his fitness for church-membership or for the ordinance of baptism, but his belief in the great truths given in the scriptures." "Great truths given in the scriptures" sounds well, and there is no particularity to the statement to come back and embarrass the orator.

Dr. Joseph Simms has returned from Australia, and is now lecturing on the Pacific coast. The San Franciscan of recent date contains evidence of his continued study of the human features, in the shape of a long illustrated article on the physiognomy of the eyes. Mr. Simms is a very entertaining writer and speaker, and his "Nature's Revelations of Character" has become a standard work among physiognomists. He is a good Freethinker withal, and does some good work in a quiet way at opening the eyes of the superstitiously blind, as well as describing the eyes that accompany peculiar character.

Gov. Abbett, of New Jersey, with the balance of the riparian commission of that state, were investigating the oyster business last week with a view to recommending to the legislature such laws as should protect the oystermen in the possession of beds planted by themselvs. After absorbing the information imparted by the dozen nativs, the governor said: "The present law as to the ownership of oysters seems to be that the fellow that gets 'em has 'em." "Yes," broke in an old veteran, "up here on the coast a ways there ain't a church-member but what steals oysters. It's like the congregation here once that heard the gun of a ship in distress during sermon time. They all started for the door. 'Hold on!' cried the preacher, 'Let's all hav a fair start.'"

When Moody was in Milwaukee, he preached a sermon on Sabbath observance. One of the first things to be done, he declared, in securing the desired regard for the Sabbath was to put a stop to the publication of Sunday newspapers, suspend the running of street cars and railway trains on that day, prevent business men from attending to office work, induce bookkeepers to select some other day for "posting up," etc., etc. One reason for there being so many dishonest clerks and defaulters, he believed, was that the class of workmen implicated were permitted to work on Sunday. If they would rob the Lord of his day, they would steal from their employers He pitied the minister who had to preach to a congregation which had but a short time previously been engaged in digesting a Sunday paper; for a man who had been perusing the news from all parts of the world was in no condition to appreciate a sermon. But the evangelist forgot to excoriate the preachers who earn their salaries by working on Sunday.

Quoting from the North American Review, "that the thinking minds of to-day are drifting away from the religious beliefs and dogmatic theology of the past, that the wave of skepticism affects the orthodox church itself, and that the great body of orthodox religious doctrins known as systematic theology are about to go to wreck with the mythology of Greece and the belief in witchcraft," Zion's Day Star says: "Truer words could not be uttered. There seems to be but little faith in most of the teachings of to-day, or in the creeds of orthodox bodies. The professed church at large seems to be losing her hold upon the people to a great extent, and many of her members are now dropping off, while the truth of many assertions previously admitted are now seriously questioned. So unpopular has become the hideous doctrin of the eternal torment of countless millions in hell, that it is seldom mentioned. The time was when people were frightened into the nominal church by fear, but that time is past, for people no longer believe that God is a tyrant who delights in the destruction of nine-tenths of all creatures he made."

The Dennison Sunday Gazette is a pretty good Infidel journal. In the last issue we find in addition to The Truth Seeker editorial on "Figures that Lie," the following good hit at the church: "The history of the Christian church has pretty thoroughly demonstrated that in proportion as the church has increased in unity, wealth, and power, the progress of the masses, intellectually and morally, has been retarded. The 'Reformation' liberated in a great measure the great mass fo the people in Germany and England from a grinding ecclesiastical despotism, but it was done at the expense of church unity, and the work of disintegration has been going on ever since. Protestants are ready enough to acknowledge the correctness of this proposition when applied to the Catholic church, but many of them, singular as it may seem, cannot realize that the Methodist church, or any other religious organization which makes 'belief' a requisit to salvation, would be as intolerant if given the opportunity that venerable church possessed so many centuries. The thoughtful Christian, who sincerely wishes to see the right of private judgment in religious matters maintained, and church and state kept entirely separate and distinct, as the fathers of the republic so wisely intended they should be, will look upon all schemes to bring about church unity with distrust."

Literary Notes.

St. Paul-Minneapolis has an illustrated weekly of the style of Puck called The Portrayer. It is bright with cartoons, sharp with wit, and independent in its editorials. The two cities that it joins will perhaps reap as much benefit from the publication of The Portrayer as The Portrayer will from the inhabitants of the two cities.

Of one of our recently published pamphlets Lucifer says: "An Antidote Analyzed, showing the folly of a religious quack, by H. Clay Luse, of Waynesburg, Pa., comes to us from the prolific press of the Truth Seeker Company, and is well worth its cost, ten cents, as an eye-opener for the people who usually depend upon the religious and political press for their information concerning Freethought and Freethinkers."

The Missouri Liberal appreciates The Truth Seeker's efforts to help the young Liberals of the country to attractiv and valuable literature: "The Truth Seeker will hav ready for New Years a new book for children and youths, by Miss Susan H. Wixon, editor of the Children's Corner in The Truth Seeker, entitled the 'Story Hour.' It contains nearly 300 pages, and is 8x10 inches in size, with 66 full page illustrations, and 25 smaller ones, and 34 stories in large type. Liberals everywhere should encourage this new departure with their patronage. This will be a beautiful and appropriate present for the children. Price, $1.25 each, or $2.00 for two. Address, The Truth Seeker, 33 Clinton Place, N. Y."

The publishers say that the January number of the North American Review is an excellent one. It presents no very famous names among its contributors, but it offers a wide variety of unusually readable articles. We are now so safely over the crisis of the presidential election that men of all parties can consider calmly Bishop Huntington's essay on "Vituperation in Politics," and it is to be hoped that what they learn from it will not be forgotten four years hence. Under the title, "The Reunited South," Henry Watterson presents with great clearness the Southern and Democratic view of the political situation as it now stands. This also is extremely interesting to every citizen, whether he agrees with Mr. Watterson or not. Another question of universal concern, which some think will soon make itself a national issue, is that of labor and its compensation; and Col. Hinton, in "American Labor Organizations," shows with what equipment it will take the field. But the article that the literary reader will first turn to is Frederick Harrison's brilliant and incisiv discussion of Froude's "Life of Carlyle;" while the religious or philosophical reader will find in Courtney's "Socrates, Buddha, and Christ," specific statements and quotations of those parallel doctrins that are so often vaguely alluded to. For the scientific reader, Mr. Proctor discusses learnedly "Herschel's Star Surveys," and Professor Le Conte presents and explains some curious facts in relation to "The Evidence of the Senses." Mr. Mulhall's paper on "The Increase of Wealth" is a successful endeavor to render large masses of figures popularly intelligible.

Mrs. Slenker's opinion of Miss Wixon's new nove is expressed in the last Investigator: "'All in a Lifetime,' by Miss Susan H. Wixon, is just the thing for the coming holidays. It will suit both old and young. It is a genuin love story, and yet full of the best kind of essays on temperance, morality, honor, industry, theology, and all that interests and instructs the average man and woman, boy or girl. It is real life, and just as charming as a fairy tale. The joys and sorrows, loves and hates, and clouds and sunshine of many lifetimes are all set before us like a vivid panorama, charming our attention clear to the end, where we draw a deep sigh and long for more, which, not being found, we go back and once more review the fascinating and favorit passages. While you find no direct attack upon the Christian religion as a whole, you are pleased at the deft way in which the theological teachings of creedlings are contrasted with the practical philosophy of real thinkers and doers. You find missionaries and ministers weak and wicked, while 'this world's' workers prove strong, sterling, and true. The one preaches love, charity, and godliness, and practices selfishness, meanness, and actual crime; while the other teaches every moral virtue, and livs them out in daily deeds. 'All in a Lifetime' shows us that a man or woman may be a sincere believer in God, heaven, and hell, belong to a church, and be in good standing among the brethren and sisters, and yet be cruel as the grave, and wicked as a demon. And, on the other hand, it proves that a good, moral life, with the motto, 'One world at a time,' leads to the highest, best, and truest morality, and the purest happiness. The sublime teachings of Confucius are quoted, proving him to hav been a far better preacher of practical truths than Moses or his God, or than was this God's only begotten son. In fine, this book givs us the cream of all reforms, embracing heredity, woman's equality, and right generation. I hope thousands of copies of this book will be bought as Christmas gifts, and I am sure no prettier or more useful book will be hung on a Christmas tree or put into a stocking in the old chimney corner." We hav a full supply of "All in a Lifetime," and will mail them promptly upon receipt of the price, $1.50.

Only women will be employed by the clerk of the Georgia legislature to perform clerical work hereafter, a resolution to that effect having been adopted by an "overwhelming vote." The Montgomery Advertiser says: "In the debate on the resolution it was contended that all avenues of employment should be open to women, who had no voice in the government, yet obeyed its laws and paid its taxes. The vote was overwhelming. Maybe the Alabama legislature will progress up to this point in the sweet time to come."

Letters from Friends.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Dec. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Much has been said in regard to prohibition both pro and con, and we think much remains to be said before the matter is settled, if it ever is. Therefore I wish to giv my opinion. When the question first began to be agitated in this state, I was rather inclined to favor it, knowing there was a great evil in the rum traffic, and was desirous of having it controled or stopped altogether, but wishing to see both sides, I climbed upon the fence to look into the opposit camp. On so doing I found as many good people there as in the prohibition ranks, and by inquiring of them why they opposed prohibition, I found they had many good reasons for so doing. But being loth to giv up my first opinion, and surely not wishing to do so if right, I hav sat on the fence nearly ever since, getting all the information possible on the subject, but finally being convinced that the prohibitionists, though perhaps well meaning, were pulling at the wrong end of the string to untangle the knot, and so were drawing it tighter and making it worse, I got down on the opposit side into the anti-prohibition camp, but still claim to be a temperance man, believing temperance to be a moderate use of a thing, and not the abuse of it. As to controling a man's conscience, or prohibiting his vices by law, it becomes more absurd to me the more I look at it. Statute laws are made (or should be) to protect people in their natural rights. For this governments are founded—that each and every one may act in unison for the mutual protection of all against invasion of natural rights, property, etc., among those natural rights being freedom to act according to the dictates of conscience. I believe a man has a right to eat, drink, wear, or worship anything he chooses, and in any way he likes, or refuse to eat, drink, wear, or worship anything, so long as he infringes on no other person's natural rights, let his manners be ever so absurd to others. He commits no crime against the state, and statute law has no business to meddle. Webster defines crime as a violation of law, but like the young law student that differed with Blackstone, we differ with Webster, and claim that many laws may be violated without committing crime, of which the sumptuary law is one. That statute laws should hav no jurisdiction over conscience or appetite I think will not be disputed by Liberals, at least, but rather to protect us in freedom to act in accordance to its best dictation. Therefore it behooves all citizens to say to the state, "Thus far, and no farther, shalt thou come." If a person commits a crime against the state, such as incendiarism, larceny, assault, or murder, then the state has a right to punish for the crime, not the cause. If a man gets drunk and abuses his family, or commits any other crime, the law should punish him for the act, not the appetite. I hav been a moderate drinker all my life, but hav never been drunk, neglected my business, or interfered with any body else's business on account of drinking, and I hold it to be absurd and an insult to my manhood for my neighbor (or his wife) to say that I shall not drink or make wine because he gets drunk Socially we are responsible for intemperance, but not politically, and so long as we depend on law and legislation to prop men up to do right, just so long will they be morally weak; but when we see to it that men are rightly born and properly educated, quit making matrimonial matches in heaven, and laws to bind them on earth, regardless of temperaments or fitness, and substituting a vicarious atonement for their shortcomings, then may we hope for a decrease in crime.

Frank Martin, in his letter in a recent issue, in reply to Mr. Walker, says: "Suppose I charge any business, such as the making of shoes, clothing, and food, with being a crime, or injuring people, would not these makers protect their business from scandal by proving immediately their good work, their important and necessary part of society? But suppose I arraign the liquor traffic as injuring people, will they attempt to prove their good intentions?" etc. We answer, Yes, and succeed, too, equally as well as the butcher, shoemaker, or any other useful tradesman, by proving that alcohol is useful in many things, and that they force none to be intemperate with it or abuse it, and by proving that as many are injured by intemperance in eating and dressing as in drinking, and we are quite sure that corsets and high-heeled shoes are as injurious as wine and beer, and that state laws hav no business to prevent the manufacture of either more than they hav to prevent the manufacture of medicin because they make poison, for fear some injudicious person may take an overdose of it, as the drunkard does of alcohol. It is an admitted fact that some take too much medicin; shall we therefore prohibit the manufacture and sale of it, and close up all drug stores, or shall we attend to our own business and let others do the same? If we persist in prohibiting all that has evil in it, we will hav to dry up the ocean and stop navigation on account of piracy, and railroads on account of accidents,

Yours for liberty of conscience, H. H. HUTCHESON.

QUINCY, MASS., Dec. 1, 1884.

THE BLOODY RELIGION.

An old theological idea,
Reviewed with the whole of things,
Barbarian, and odd, and very queer,
And of which the good Christian sings.

"This is the law of the trespass offering. It is most holy. In the place where they kill the burnt offering, shall they kill the trespass offering, and the blood thereof shall be sprinkled around about upon the altar" (Lev. vii, 1). "And Aaron shall make an atonement upon the horns of the altar, once a year. With the blood of the sin offering of atonement he shall make atonement. It is most holy unto the Lord" (Ex. xxx, 10). "Jesus said, This is the blood of the new testament that is shed for the remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi, 28).

A BLOODY BIBLE.

A myth, a legend, a Jewish story,
Of that first mistake ever made,
A blunder for God's eternal glory,
Still preached as the pulpit trade.

"He took the blood of calves, and of goats, and sprinkled both the book, and the people, saying, This is the blood of the testament, which God hath ordained unto you" (Heb. ix, 19). "And Hilkiah said, I hav found the book of the law in the house of the Lord" (2 Chron. xxxiv, 15). "Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the Lord what he did in the Red Sea and in the brooks of Arnon" (Num. xxi, 14). "The revelation of Jesus Christ unto him that washed us from our sins in his own blood" (Rev. i, 5).

A BLOODTHIRSTY GOD.

For God's gusto rivers of blood hav flowed;
In human blood he takes delight.
Thus his grace and calamity bestowed,
Both show his providence all right.

"The Lord is a man of war. The Lord is his name" (Ex. xv, 3). "Hear, O Israel! ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies. Let not your heart faint: fear not, and do not tremble, neither be ye terrified. For the Lord your God is he that goeth with you to fight for you to save you. And when the Lord thy God hath delivered thine enemies into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword. But the women, and the spoils thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself, and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies, which the Lord thy God giveth thee" (Deut. xx, 2). "And the children of Israel fled before Judah, and God delivered them into their hand. And Abijah and his people slew them with a great slaughter, so there fell down slain of Israel five hundred thousand chosen men" (2 Chron. xiii, 17). "And the children of Benjamin destroyed down to the ground of the Israelites that day twenty and two thousand men. And the children of Israel came near the children of Benjamin the second day: and Benjamin went forth and destroyed, down to the ground, of the children of Israel, eighteen thousand men; all these drew the sword" (Judges xx, 25). "And the Lord discomfited them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter; and chased them and smote them unto Mekadah. And it came to pass, as they fled before Israel, that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them, and they died. There were more that died from hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew by the sword. Then spake Joshua, and said, Sun! stand thou still upon Gibeon! And thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon! And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselvs upon their enemies. And there was no day like that before it, nor after it, when the Lord hearkened to the voice of a man: for the Lord fought for Israel" (Josh. x, 11).

CHRISTIANITY SOAKED IN HUMAN BLOOD.

The church, redeemed by blood, prayers made,
And failed, for Garfield, when he died.
Thus, in saving faith, all the churches prayed,
And now they know some one has lied.

"The Lord said that thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies; and the tongue of thy dog in the same" (Ps. lxviii, 23). "The righteous shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked" (Ps. lviii, 10). "For this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for the remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi, 28). "Whom God has set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood" (Rom. iii, 25). "Being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him" (Rom. v, 9). "The covenant of blood" (Heb. x, 29). "For it is the blood that maketh atonement for the soul" (Lev. xvii, 11). "And cursed be he that keepeth his sword from blood" (Jer. xlviii, 10). "They build up Zion with blood" (Mic. iii, 10). "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv" (Ex. xxii, 18). "The great wine-press of the wrath of God. And it was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the wine-press, even to the horses' bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs" (Rev. xiv, 20).

And such is the pure gospel idea,
For which the lowly Jesus swooned.
It makes you sick, by faith and your fear,
And then by faith it heals the wound.

And now, surely I need not quote half of this bloody book to show how much the God-idea and Christianity hav soaked this planet with human blood. Judaism was a system of bloodshed, and this is the germ that eliminated Christianity, as the account of Jesus abundantly proves. And this barbarian idea of bloodshed permeates the Bible and the Christian church. It was this condition of things in Christendom that culminated in the hell-born murders under the false suspicion of witchcraft that hav sodden this earth with the blood of nine millions slain by Christians of their own kith and kin, of men, women, and children put to a sudden and violent death. And but for the brevity I study, I would here enumerate some of the methods of torture invented by Christian ingenuity, that were never practiced by the wild savages. Tortures by the thumbscrew and pouring red-hot lead into the ears giv to Christians the palm for cruelty. And of this I was forcibly reminded recently, in attending the fair of the American Institute, in Boston. In the Mexican exhibit I saw a most horrible picture of a popish victim doomed to crucifix. It was painted between 1612 and 1630, and represents a man about forty years of age, denuded and tied to a tree. Both arms were extended, like Jesus on the cross, and tied to the limbs of the tree. The priest, or executioner, was engaged with a knife, cutting and stripping each muscle separately from his bones, while he was alive to endure the torture. He had cut around one wrist, and stripped the muscles down to his shoulder, where they hung, dripping with blood. Nor would it be possible for me to describe the ghastly horror depicted in that victim's face, and the contortions of his body, still to be flayed by his Christian murderer.

And from the persecutions I hav myself endured from Christianity for half a century past, it is my opinion that if the ignorance and the credulity—which always go together—of the people were to-day what they were in the days of witchcraft, Christianity would now cause human blood to flow as it did three hundred years ago. The Bible is the same now as it was then, and its bloodthirsty God is "the same to-day, yesterday, and forever" (Heb. xiii, 8). And so are superstition and credulity the same.

Nature's order forever! Nature's order and laws in the whole of things! A living, self-controling, and progressiv humanity is not now so green as when, in youth, the Jews "saw the sun stand still." And science now shines more clearly upon those old barbarian theories. Hence the star of humanity's hope is now a living reality, in every hearty organism, of future good—a complete success, ever and forever, more and more.

LAROY SUNDERLAND.

FRESNO CITY, CAL., Dec. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am opposed to the paying of twenty-five dollars to a chaplain for prayers for the legislators. In my last letter that was published in a city paper, I asked the following question: "Is there a Bible God, or a Christian God, or any divine being that hears and answers prayer?" This called out a long letter from B. R. Turner, which I replied to. I think there is good evidence that there is no prayer-answering God. The within letter was held for several weeks by the editor, and then returned. Probably he was afraid to publish it, or was persuaded not to. I know of but one besides myself in this city who is willing to let himself be known as a Liberal.

GEORGE PADDINGTON.

FRESNO CITY, CAL., Nov, 8, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE REPUBLICAN: Please giv me a small place in your paper to reply to a letter published in your issue of July 5th, on the subject of prayer, by B. R Turner. I do not object to praying, but I do object to paying taxpayers' money for such an uncertain thing as prayer. As this is not a Christian nation, no public money should be devoted to the propagation of any religion. Mr. Turner says my views about God and prayer are crude. I do not know that there is any God, or any use in praying. If that is crudeness, be it so. He says if God had so ordained it, good men could hav saved the world to Christ. Did God prevent good men from saving the world? If so, who is to blame that the world is not saved—God or good men? Either God could not or would not ordain that good men might save all mankind. He claims that God arranged matters. Did God do it for the best? Does Mr. Turner pray that God shall change his arrangement for the worse? Or does he intend to instruct God what he ought and what he ought not to do? He inquires where I obtained the evidence that there is no prayer answered by God, and asks me to giv that evidence. It would be superfluous to deny what no man has claimed to see or can see, and is past finding out. Can you, Mr. Turner, prove that there is a God that does answer prayer? I think there is good evidence that there is no prayer ever answered by God. You think I am Atheistic. I do not say that there is no God, but I do say that I do not know there is a God. Sir, do you know that there is? If you do, will you please giv the proof? You say God is seen by the mental eye. Are you sure that it is not the eye of the imagination? To prevent you making any further mistakes, please find the Bible description of the Christian God: Fire in his mouth, smoke from his nostrils; water and clouds all around (see Psalms xvii); his hair white, eyes flaming fire, his feet like fine brass (Rev. i); horns on his head, fire at his feet (Hab. iii); clothed in white, wearing a girdle (Rev. i); a two-edged sword in his mouth. Please read these texts. You say I think praying people are not honest. On the contrary, I think a great many are sincere, but hav been deceived by the clergy, who preach that which they know nothing about, and claim to be stating facts which must be believed and obeyed on pain of endless torture. You offer to pray for me, and say you will do so. Thanks.

Even if I were a Christian I should not know which church to go to as the true church, providing there is one. If the Catholics hav the truth, Protestantism is false; or if Second Adventism is true, which teaches that the seventh day is the Sabbath, then Sunday-worshipers are mistaken. All claim to be true, and all may be, and probably are, false.

GEORGE PADDINGTON.

"N. G. W." ON LANDLORDISM.

MR. EDITOR: Without taking any issue with the criticism in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November, I would suggest a complemental fact bearing against the social expediency of allowing to any party the control over a greater area of soil than corresponds to the uses and forces of a family without reckoning upon hired labor. This is my fact, that the excessiv pressure of capitalists upon preletaries leaves the latter often no other resource for subsistence than the soil, where this is free to squatters, and though this can be but a temporary resource, yet it actually makes the difference between life and death, or worse than death, to many thousands. These destitute persons cannot travel in quest of unoccupied government lands. In view of the security of property, as well as the abatement of misery, so long as there is land anywhere not in actual use, it ought to be opened to the destitute. The trades unions might, under such considerate legislation, more easily and economically provide change of occupation for surplus labor at crises like the present, when so many operativs are turned adrift. The soil ought to be managed as a compensation balance to the oscillations of manufacturing production.

The cause of Freethought is advancing in Ohio. Gov. Hoadly was known to be a Liberal before he was elected governor. The Republicans made that charge against him, and they were defeated. I hope Cleveland will remember the clergy as they remembered him. There is not a Democratic Methodist clergyman in the Methodist conference in northern Ohio, but that will no doubt ask him to put God in his proclamation. The worship of the unknowable is as much idolatry to-day with a certain class as it was a thousand years ago. They pray to the unknowable and the unknown the same as do the so-called heathen who get down on their knees and pray to their gods made of stone. In so doing they only represent the idea they entertain of their god. I heard a clergyman say in his sermon last Sunday that God directed the affairs of man, and to prove that fact he said that some time ago he was making preparation to take a trip West. In going to the railroad he missed the train by being a few minutes late. He said he was worried about being late, but the still small voice told him God directed all things for the best, and he would submit patiently to God's order. The train had not gone far till the news came back that there was a wreck, and many lives lost, which proved conclusivly to his mind that there was a special providence. I spoke to a deacon sitting by my side, and asked him where the special providence was to those who were killed in the wreck.

The orthodox Quakers are now holding a meeting near here. I heard a preacher of the Quaker faith make this remark in refer ence to the obedience God demanded of his followers. He said he knew a lady who was called to do some missionary work. She prayed to the Lord to relieve her from the work, for she had two small children to support, and had to support them with the needle. The Lord said, "No, you must go and do the work." She made up her mind she could not go and leave her children. The Lord took away one of her children. It was not long after the burial of her child that the Lord called her again to the missionary work. She brought forth the same excuse, that she could not leave her child. The Lord caused sickness to take away the other child, so as to leave no excuse for the lady to do missionary work. I said to a Quaker, "Deliver me from the worship of such a God as that." A clergyman said the other day that he hoped the government would send the army and exterminate the Mormons. I asked him why they didn't send missionaries among the Mormons instead of sending them to the isles of the sea. Mormonism has grown up in our midst in this generation.

MR. EDITOR: I must say I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better thau any other Freethought paper I ever read, and grieve that I must stop it, as I hav not got the money, and don't know when I will hav. It is hard times for me, at least, as I am an old man past sixty-five years, a cripple since my youth, with a broken constitution, and unable to earn my living. I would like to write a few lines for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but am so uneducated I cannot write suitable for publication. I hav read many pieces in your paper that I would reply to had I been able.

I will say something in regard to the controversy going on frequently in the papers between brother Spiritualists and Materialists. I am sorry to see this. Spiritualists do not believe in the orthodox God or Bible God, but in the powers of nature. I believe that we come from nature, are a part of nature, and as we, the human family, are the highest type of animal life—intellectually—who knows but the life of man, when leaving the body at death, goes back to nature and nature retains its life-powers, or properties, and is able to giv back somethiug called spirit in some form? I hav had the same experience that Elmina has been having, and good a deal more, to no effect but to confirm my positivism. I was, for many years, as strong set against Spiritualism as Elmina or T. Winter could be, and could or would not believe.

Some years ago I buried a son; ten days after I laid his mother beside him. About ten years later, in open daylight, I saw a boy coming toward me; he was, to all appearances, twenty rods away, and coming very straight, and I watched him closely as he came within four or five rods of me. He stopped, threw up his face toward me, and smiled very pleasantly at me; apparently rising on tip-toe, he started sideways on a right hop and passed behind a pile of straw. I had supposed it was a neighbor's boy that I could place somewhere, until he looked up at me; then I knew it was no neighbor's boy, but my own. What next? Like Elmina, I wanted proof of what I believed contrary to what I saw and knew. I sent another son around the straw to see who was there, but no one could be found. I went in and was looking through the window over the same ground, and a hand was laid carefully on my shoulder, and these words were spoken: "It is curious you did not know Benny." That was my wife's hand on my shoulder and voice in my ear, as plain as in her life. Benjamin was my son's name. I hav any quantity of personal and positiv knowledge on the above subject, but cannot put it on paper.

MR. EDITOR: Having sent nothing in the form of excuses or otherwise, for a long time; and for want of something more substantial, I thought it best to send more excuses, and plead for a little more time. As soon as snow fell it seemed impossible to get work that I could see to do at any price, though I see to read and write through a powerful glass, which is useless for other purposes. Nevertheless my prospects are growing brighter as time advances; Congress cannot much longer withstand the urgent demands of twenty-eight state legislatures who hav long since instructed their servants there to pass the Mexican pension bill. And now, since that most damnable of all publie scourges, the Republican party, with their vicegerent of the devil, Jim Blaine, hav received severe chastisment from an outraged people, I think our hirelings in Congress will not dare to resist their employers' demands much longer. It is amusing to note the many causes given by different individuals for the downfall of Blaine and his party. In my estimation it was not Burchard, it was not the foul weather, it was not the great dinner party, nor any of the thousands of causes advanced by the "wise ones." But the fact is in "a nutshell." The wickedness of that party had become so great that it had become the unfittest in the race for existence in this enlightened republic.

Without regard to what Congress may or may not do for the few survivors of the Mexican war, I feel confident that I can catch up with my subscription, and will soon remit. "Where there is a will there is a way."

NELSON HUNT.

PAYSON, UTAH, Dec. 10, 284.

MR. EDITOR: To me the "Letters from Friends" is an interesting part of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and especially the letters from Utah. If there is any one place in the union more than another that needs Freethought literature and lecturers it is here in Utah to fight this modern mother of harlots, Mormonism. A great many when they get disgusted with her pull up and leave the territory, but some of us must stop and giv her a deal. I am anxious to see a territorial League organized here, and things put in good fighting shape.

I hav traveled over a hundred miles to get the few names to the petition I sent you. I find but few who are willing to be known as Freethinkers. They will read my tracts, but not allow anything in the shape of Freethought literature to be sent to them through the mail. I can hardly blame them. To men in business it is almost financial ruin for them to do so. But a few are getting a little more bold. I would like to correspond with some of the Freethought friends in the north and south of this territory in regard to organizing so that we can make a more complete fight. There is still a great prejudice against apostates here, but the saints are very civil to an apostate as long as he will hold his tongue, but the moment he asserts his rights, especially if those rights should conflict with their superstitious religion, look out for squalls. I am seven miles from a town, and my means are small, but I intend to do what little I can to break down superstition, and to build up the cause of humanity. It is amusing to hear some of my neighbors tell their children that I am a good man in some respects, but that they must not take any of my tracts, nor take notice of anything I say in regard to religion.

Please let us know through THE TRUTH SEEKER when Messrs. Watts and Putnam will be in Utah.

With best wishes for the future of the National Liberal League, I remain, Yours for truth, H. S. BROOKS.

ORWELL, VT., Dec. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As the new departure of the Rev. Heber Newton has so stirred the quiet pool of orthodoxy, and the Rev. H. W. Beecher having said more radical things to shock the church, I thought that a few words from the Edinburgh Review, No. 121, as to Luther's faith in the Bible, would perhaps be of some interest to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Luther cast serious doubts upon the inspiration of some books, and rejected others. Thus he writes:

"The books of Kings are more worthy of credit than the books of Chronicles."

"Job spoke not as it stands written in his book, but had only such cogitations. It is merely the argument of a fable. It is probable that Solomon made and wrote this book."

"The book entitled Ecclesiastes ought to hav been more full. There is too much incoherent matter in it. Solomon has not, therefore, written this book, which was made in the days of the Maccabees, by Sirach. It is like a Talmud, compiled from many books, perhaps in Egypt, at the desire of King Evergetes. So hav also the Proverbs of Solomon been collected by others."

"The book of Esther I toss into the Elbe. I am such an enemy to the book of Esther that I wish it did not exist; for it Judaizes too much, and has in it a great deal of heathenish naughtiness."

"Isaiah the prophet has borrowed his knowledge and his art from the Psalter."

"The history of Jonah is so monstrous that it is absolutely incredible."

"That the Epistle to the Hebrews is not by St. Paul, nor by any other apostle at all, is shown by chapter ii, verse 3. It is by an excellent, a learned, man, a disciple of the apostles. It should be no stumbling-block if there be found in it a mixture of wood, straw, and hay."

He called the Epistle of St. James "an epistle of straw," and adds: "In the Revelation of St. John too much is wanting to hav me deem it apostolical. I can discern no trace in it that it is established by the spirit."

May we not add that to be true disciples of Luther, we are to condemn that theological assumption of infallibility which would separate the Bible from all other books and demand a prostration of our reason in the very act of examination? May we not say that Martin Luther was the great founder of that scientific examination of the Bible which originated in Germany, and is now dawning upon England and America?

FORT SULLY, D. T., Dec. 9, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $11, for which send me "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and THE TRUTH SEEKER to a trial subscriber as directed below. I hav received some printed or lithographed letters from one Livezey, who claims having brought to grief and silenced all Infidel writers in the country. He certainly has more time then good common sense, for I hav seen several in your paper asking the same question, what he is up to; he had better be barking at the moon like the Indian's dog.

Election is over; Spiritualism and Materialism are going it hot and heavy, and the —— knows what next. In this place orthodox Christianity is too shallow for the brethren to get up an excitement; at least, it seems so to me. That horrid paper is getting there for good, as you will see before long. I am thinking some good lecturer would make a stir among the boys in blue; if any should come to Pierre, I agree to take him to Fort Sully and back, free of charge. Come! don't all speak at once. Yours, FRED. GARING.

TURNERS FALLS, MASS., Dec. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I humbly beg pardon for so neglecting my duty as to compel you to write me for your honest dues. I inclose five dollars to go to my credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope I may never be so poor or so negligent as to hav my copy of the dear old TRUTH SEEKER stopped. The only excuse I hav to offer is that I expected to be in New York before this, and hav the pleasure of paying you in person.

There is a large Liberal element here which should be organized. I think if one of our good speakers would come here they would help the cause very much. I once offered Mr. Charles Watts thirty dollars for a Sunday lecture, and will now furnish a good hall and pay that sum to him or some other speaker for a Sunday lecture. We once had C. B. Lynn, and he did us good and went away satisfied and happy. I wanted to be at Salamanca, but business prevented it. I was pleased to see in the Boston Globe that Anthony Comstock was in trouble. I hope he will at least hav as much sorrow as he caused our friend and worthy leader, D. M. Bennett. With best wishes for your prosperity, I am as ever your friend,

GEO. E. HARTLY

PASSAIC, N. J., Dec. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am an English Freethinker, who has been in this country scarcely one year, and has taken your esteemed paper about six months. You will excuse me if I ask you why you don't remind your readers that Mgr. Capel, referred to in past issues, came to this country to hide the shame of a bankruptcy brought about by eating more beef, drinking more wine, living in a bigger house, and keeping more servants than he could pay for. You may hav done so, and that is why I ask you to excuse me. When living near London, I went to a few of his religious plays. I am a workingman.

Very truly yours, T. D. HATFIELD.

MOLINE, ILL., Dec. 11, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am once more at home, and am delighted at the brightening prospects of the Liberal cause. The star has indeed risen in the east; its beams are penetrating the west—bright harbinger of final success of truth and the downfall of superstition. Only think of it—I hav already received $0.75 for a trial subscriber to the best paper for all that the sun ever shone upon. If you will send me a few extra numbers of Dec. 6th, and so on, I will try and make them available.

Fraternally yours, O. CHILD.

313 BIENVILLE ST., NEW ORLEANS, LA., Dec. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Never a child longed for its dear mamma as does your humble servant for sight and possession of the stanch and loyal TRUTH SEEKER. The weeks were never so long before. I want to ask our friends through your columns if there are any Liberal-minded men and women in this God-ful—I mean this word in the same sense as "soul-ful"—city. My one Liberal friend here informs me there are none. Is it possible? The very thought puts me in sympathy with the oft-misinterpreted Hamlet, and I am ready at once "to fly to ills I know not of" that I may escape those of the present, occasioned by the close atmosphere of a priest-ridden and superstition-bound people.

Never in my life hav I so hungered for mental food in the way of Freethought argument, though it come from the most ignorant and uncultured Freethinking barbarian of only average reading capacity, as since my arrival in New Orleans. On the 30th of November I craved with all the enthusiasm of childhood to be in my old seat at our hall in Philadelphia and hearken to the clarion notes of wit and wisdom from the king of orators, Mr. Watts, and the great-souled secretary, Mr. Putnam.

I hope none of our Liberal friends will pass through New Orleans without at least a call.

If by your help I may be able to find congenial spirits in the flesh, I shall be glad. If they are so disposed, we can hav our social gatherings and meetings in my parlors. My intention is to remain here through the winter, till the close of the Exposition.

I wish I were able to send a handsome sum toward the Campaign Fund—but wishes do not take the place of money.

Cordially, EL. D. L.

OBITUARY NOTICE.

Another lifelong Liberal has crossed the great divide. On the morning of Nov. 23d Mr. P. C. Johnson died, after a painful illness, from double pneumonia of four weeks' duration, aged sixty-one years and one month.

Mr. Johnson was a nativ of Prussia, coming to America thirty years ago, and having resided in Central City since 1860. From early boyhood he thought for himself, and no man or church ever kept his conscience. He never bartered his Liberal principles for popularity or made merchandise of his integrity for gold.

He was interested in all Liberal and humanitarian movements. For many years he took THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers. During Mr. Bennett's imprisonment he was with him heart and soul, forwarding to him several times generous sums of money from himself, his son, and from the large-hearted men of Central and Black Hawk.

Always a reverent student of nature, he saw the infinit in the humblest flower and insect. Peculiarly reticent, he was understood and appreciated only by intimate friends.

As a husband and father he was tender, loving, and genial. His home was his heaven; his home-life one sweet, glad poem; his death, that of a calm philosopher. He left all directions for the conducting of his funeral. During his illness, I asked him what he thought of the beyond. His answer was: "That takes care of itself. A right life is the only needed preparation for death."

Messrs. John Jenkins and Austin Smith, two prominent Liberals, came from Denver, and we had a Liberal funeral—the first, I think, ever held here.

An undaunted Liberal, a good man, has gone; but his tender words, his kind deeds, his pure life, linger with us to sweeten our sorrow. MRS. H. L. BUCKNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

EARLVILLE, ILL., Dec. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I now find myself in Illinois. I arrived home the 26th of November, just in time for a Thanksgiving dinner, and were all very thankful to dine together once more. My journey was long, and riding over the hills and valleys of Maine was a little rough on me, but I hav survived it. When I wrote you last, I was sitting where I could view the old Kennebec, but not stopping but a day or two in a place, and so many friends to talk with, I had but little time for writing only to friends at home. I hav had no time for reading even, and feel as though I am a whole year behind the times. I hav such a pile of TRUTH SEEKERS waiting to be read, and then I hope I shall be better posted; but I hav been looking them over, and see that Elmina has visited Boston to investigate Spiritualism. I also had the pleasure of attending a Spiritual camp-meeting in hopes to see or hear something that would convince me of a spirit life. Mr. Chase, of California, and Dr. Webster, of Portland, and a Mr. Fairfield from Boston, were all on the stand, and one lady speaker. Mr. Fairfield, under spirit influence, said he could see departed spirits all around him, but as my eyes were so dim, I could not see them myself, so I will hav to depend on his word for what he saw, but their lectures were all very good; think they are doing a grand work in reform from old orthodoxy. The meeting was held on the banks of the beautiful Hayden Lake Madison. My letter is getting long; will close; more anon.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night begins to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Hang up the Baby's Stocking.

Hang up the baby's stocking,
Be sure you don't forget—
The dear little dimpled darling!
She ne'er saw Christmas yet;
But I've told her all about it,
And she opened her big blue eyes,
And I'm sure she understands it,
She looks so funny and wise.

Dear! what a tiny stocking!
It doesn't take much to hold
Such little pin toes as baby's
Away from the frost and cold.
But then, for the baby's Christmas
It will never do at all;
Why Santa wouldn't be looking
For anything half so small!

I know what we will do for the baby—
I've thought of the very best plan—
I'll borrow a stocking of grandma,
The longest that ever I can;
And you'll hang it by mine dear mother,
Right here in the corner, so,
And write a letter to Santa,
And fasten it on the toe.

Write: "This is the baby's stocking
That hangs in the corner here;
You never hav seen her, Santa,
For she only came this year;
But she's just the blessedest baby—
And now before you go
Just cram her stocking with goodies,
From the top clean down to the toe."

—Little Corporal.

A Christmas Letter for You.

Everything is so pretty at Christmas time! Little Winifred Lewis thought all the world—and her world just then was bounded by the city in which she lived—was one big fairy garden.

She wrapped her ragged shawl closer around her and danced along the street, enjoying the prettily-dressed store windows filled with toys, candies, oranges, and all sorts of fanciful things designed to attract the attention of both big and little folks.

She paused before one broad, gaily-decorated, and brightly-lighted window, and clasped her little hands, blue with cold, in delighted wonder. In one end was a miniature home-scene—a cunning little table, chairs, a little crib, with a doll-baby lying, apparently fast asleep, in it; a fireplace, and baby's stocking hanging in the corner, waiting for Christmas goodies.

Opposit was a reindeer, harnessed to a darling little red sleigh, and in it was seated a funny old Santa Claus man, with a jolly, round, red face, long, white whiskers and hair, and great blue eyes that seemed to look all ways and to see all things. His fur overcoat had many deep pockets, and every pocket was stuffed with dolls, tops, wagons, horses, carts, engins—everything in the toy line that you could need or mention.

Winifred looked and looked, feasting her eyes upon the lovely vision. She knew this was only fixed up for the occasion, and she wondered if there was indeed a real Santa Claus anywhere in the world. She did not remember that he had ever looked after her if there was one, and it puzzled her dear little brain to understand why. She tried to be a good girl, and if he brought gifts to good girls, why did he not sometimes bring something to her?

She did want a dolly so much, for she had never owned a real doll in all her life.

Winnie lived with an old couple, who in the long-ago time had been slaves, and they were black, and they called Winnie their little snow-drop, she was so white and fair.

The way it happened that the little girl became an inmate of their humble home was this: When her papa died first, and then her mamma, Uncle Zebulon and Aunt Chloe, as the aged couple were called, had pity on the poor little orphan and took her into their own home, seeing as there was nobody else to take her in. They had worked for her mamma in brighter and happier days, before sickness and poverty came, and when dying the poor mother placed Winnie in Aunt Chloe's care, and gave her instructions to write to the child's grandparents away in a Northern state, and state that she was all alone in the world, her papa and mamma both gone, and then, she said, "Somebody will come, or send money, to bring Winnie to her own kindred.

Uncle Zebulon hired a lawyer to write to the people named by Winnie's mamma, but no response ever came, and one day, quite a while afterward, Uncle Zebulon and Aunt Chloe talked the matter over, and concluded that they would go "Norf" and see if they could find "de chile's folks."

"Mebbe as how dey's pinin' for de young 'un all dis time," said Uncle Zebulon.

"But why didn' dey write an' fine out about her? An' why didn' dey sen' de money for t' fetch her to dem?" and Aunt Chloe shook her head doubtfully.

"I dunno, Chloe. White folks is deep, an' mebbe dey was 'spectin' dere might be some cheatin' goin' on, or sumfin."

Well, after a good deal of talking and taking leave of friends, Uncle Zebulon and Aunt Chloe, and little Winifred Lewis, with all her worldly goods—papers, and documents, and all she had, did not fill one small trunk—started on their journey. Christmas time found them in the big city, as mentioned in the beginning of this story.

Aunt Chloe had been sick on coming into the cold Northern climate, and had not been able to look about much for Winnie's grandparents, and Uncle Zebulon had the rheumatism, and besides, when he thought that he would certainly hav to part with Winnie, he felt sorry and sad, and perhaps did not bestir himself in her behalf a great deal. But the money he had was nearly all gone, Winnie's shoes were all out at the toes, and Uncle Zebulon and Aunt Chloe were nearly discouraged.

One afternoon there was not a morsel in the house for Winnie to eat, and she was very hungry. It was the day before Christmas, too.

"I mustn't starve," said Winnie, softly, to herself; and then, clapping her hands, as a new thought came into her head, she hastily snatched her ragged shawl, and throwing it over her head, she opened the door and went out in the cold, whispering, "Uncle Zeb and Aunt Chloe are hungry, too."

What did she do but run along to a fashionable street where was a row of handsome brick houses. She knocked faintly at the door of one, and when the maid appeared she timidly inquired, "Please, ma'am, hav you any cold pieces for a poor lIttle girl who is almost starved?"

"No, I haint!" was the reply, and the door was slammed in her face; but, nothing daunted by this rebuff, she went to the next house and asked the same question.

She finally obtained two or three crusts of bread and a bit of meat, but she thought it was not enough for them all, and so she resolved to call at one or two more places.

The next house had elegant white marble steps, and was a handsome and imposing structure. Winnie crept around to the back door and rapped. Nobody came. Then she pulled the bell, and a nice-looking Irish woman came to the door.

"She's almost as old as Aunt Chloe," thought Winnie, as she asked for a few "cold pieces."

Instead of answering her, the woman stood and gazed at the wan little object before her, and did not speak a word. When she did speak she called to some one within.

"Pathrick!"

"Wot is it?"

"Come here, to onct!"

Patrick came, and the two looked at Winnie, and then at each other, and nodded.

"Who does she remoind ye of, Pathrick?"

"But ye know we musn't shpake her name; 'whist Margret, for the life ov ye don't shpake the name."

"What is your name, little gurl?" inquired Margaret.

"Winifred Damon Lewis!" answered Winnie.

Margaret uttered a scream, and Patrick shrieked, "Saints forbid!" and raised his hands.

They pulled Winnie into the house, however, and, with closed doors, they whispered together, and asked Winnie many questions. When she returned to the place she called home, she carried a big basket filled with bread, meat, cake, pie, and fruit, and Margaret went with her, and Uncle Zebulon and Aunt Chloe were made the recipients of a mysterious confidence.

Margaret went home with a determined air, and she and Patrick had a consultation.

"We shall lose our places and be turned out in the cowld world, shure," said he.

"I doon't care," replied Margaret. "I'll do phat's right, place or no place. Lave ivery blissid thing to me, and it 'll be jist right."

In the evening, Margaret went to Uncle Zebulon's abode, and brought Winnie back with her, and also several papers that had belonged to her dead mamma. Then she gave Winnie instructions of what to do and what to say later on, when in the presence of a certain person that she had not yet seen. When the right time came, she was stationed in the library. She was nearly seven years old, but she had never before been in such a beautiful room. Her heart beat audibly when the door opened, and an old gentleman, with hair as white as that of the Santa Claus she had seen in the shop window, looked down upon her. But he was stern and cold and icy. Nevertheless, she did as the good Irish woman told her and reached up her hands to be taken. The man looked in her face and shivered visibly as his head sank on his breast. He wrung his hands and said, "What is this?—Oh, what is this?"

Winnie looked up and smiled, as she said, in her sweet voice, the words that Margaret had bidden her to say:

"If you please, I'm a Christmas letter for you, grandpa!"

If you could hav looked into the room a few minutes later, you would hav seen little Winnie sitting on the old gentleman's knee, her curly head nestled close to his breast, and he bending over her and crying like a baby.

It was a good while before he rang the bell and summoned Margaret and Patrick, who approached him in fear and trembling. But they went away smiling and happy.

Perhaps you hav guessed by this time that the old gentleman was Winnie's real grandfather.

Winnie's mother was his only child, and when she had grown up to be a young lady she married a man, very much against her papa's wishes, and without his consent. He was so enraged at her conduct that he forbade her to come home any more, and would not allow her name to be mentioned in his house, or in his presence, by any one. She went away to a Southern city with her husband, who, although a worthy young man, was not well off in this world's goods and had a hard struggle to get along. After his death, Winnie's mother wrote many letters to her father, but he never would read one of them.

"Did he get the letter that Uncle Zebulon wrote?" you ask.

Why, yes, he did, but he would take no notice of it, thinking it was an effort to extort money from him.

Winnie's grandmother had died shortly before, and after that Mr. Damon, for that was his name, was more moody and reserved than ever.

When Winnie appeared at the door begging for something to eat, Margaret and Patrick, who were a long time in the family, observed the resemblance of the child to the other Winifred, Mr. Damon's daughter, and, questioning her, they thought they discovered the relationship she bore to their employer. An interview with the old colored couple confirmed their opinion. Margaret then confirmed the scene related above, judging rightly that the appearance of the child would melt the heart of her aged grandpa.

He was not slow to note the close resemblance of the child to his own daughter, and was greatly affected by it. All the hardness and sternness of his nature melted before the sweet little face that looked up to him with his dead daughter's eyes and expression in every feature.

The next morning when Winifred awoke you can imagin that her eyes grew round and large as she surveyed the pretty room in which she had slept. It was her own dear mamma's room, and had never been opened until that Christmas eve since the day she left it. Nobody had slept in the bed since she slept there, and was it not romantic that her own little girl should be the next one to occupy that lovely room?

Margaret was on hand to dress her, and from somewhere there had come, oh, such beautiful new clothes, and when Winnie went down stairs her white-haired grandpa kissed her again and again, and cried over her, too, though he tried not to let anyone see the tears that fell from his eyes.

She had a lot of pretty little presents, a big dolly and a little one, and a great many more things besides. But she was not happy, somehow, away from Uncle Zebulon and Aunt Chloe, and would giv her newly-found grandpa no peace until he took her in his great carriage to where they lived. They were made comfortable and happy, as was right they should be, and when Aunt Chloe recovered her health, Mr. Damon paid their expenses back to their Southern home, as they wished to return there, and gave them a handsome sum besides for all their trouble in bringing him so precious a grandchild all the way from Georgia.

Winnie's grandpapa just doats upon her, and both are very happy together. She is his little companion, and together they do a great deal of good to the poor and unfortunate.

"I do not know what I should hav done," he said one day, "I was so very lonely, if you, my dear little girl, had not brought—"

"A Christmas letter to you, grandpa," said Winnie, as she sat and braided his long white whiskers, and finished by tying them with the red ribbon that usually held her own pretty curls in place.

Views my first with beaming eye.

The storm-tossed woman, man, or boy,
Greets my second, too, with joy.

My third sheds light from sea to sea,
With power great; what can it be?

The sailor thinks of home again,
As he heaves my fourth upon the main.

My fifth, when right denomination,
Meets my fifth; saves degradation.

Sixth: The writer, heretofore, concealed,
Stands plain before you, self-revealed.

So, ladies, when in Grand Rapids, make
A call on "Esprit Fort," and seventh take.

A WORD IN A WORD.

Ye sweet-singing birds,
In your midst I hav found her;
With the sweetest of words,
And the shamrock we've crowned her.

UNCLE JAMES.

3.

RIDDLE.

I.—I am one and three,
But not Trinity;
I hav the strength and the power.
Without my aid nor church or tower could ye erect.
Strong and perfect,
I am not God.

II.—I hav wings and sail through the air;
Not imaginary, but truly and fair.
My garment is white, I am no host;
Neither a dove or Holy Ghost.

III.—I giv the wine, the symbol of blood,
Superstitious believe, shed for their good.
I am neither father, ghost, nor son;
Three different objects, my name is but one.

[In response to many inquiries regarding our new book, "The Story Hour," I will say that ere you read this, it will probably be finished and ready for delivery. The Truth Seeker Company will make it a very handsome and attractiv volume, and I am sure you will all want a copy.—ED. C. C.]

[J. K. P. Baker writes that the story of "Montagew and His Yacht," is like the initials of the author—a "G. E M." And we all coincide with that opinion.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

NEWARK, N. J., Nov. 8, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Please pardon me for writing this letter, but as my father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav made out one of your puzzles—M. Bernheim's, It is "patella." I hav never made one out before, and I am very much pleased. It is fun; but it takes an awful lot of trouble. If I had not looked in the dictionary for a word beginning with "pat," I don't think I could hav made it out. I am twelve years old—do you think I shall be smart? Hoping you will liv long and see many TRUTH SEEKERS published, I am

Yours truly, JOHN D. PICKFORD.

[We feel very sure that John is a bright, intelligent boy already, and if he continues to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will profit by its teachings and principles, he will develop into a noble, upright, honorable man, whom every one will admire and respect. We shall be pleased to hear from him again.—ED. C. C.]

Poetry.

The New Christmas.

It once was thought the proper thing
Soon as the Christmas bells should ring
To tell each man he was a sinner!
But now we ask, "Hav you a dinner?"
I'm very glad that fashions change,
For, to my mind, it seemed most strange
To hear of how through Adam's fall
We had been proven sinners, all!
And that in manger Christ was born,
To help us from that pit forlorn,
In which we fell, when one bad man
Spoiled all the wise creator's plan!
And very much I used to fret
That innocence must pay the debt
Contracted by our father Ad.,
For I had always thought it bad
When schoolboy, for the love of fun,
Suffered a wholly guiltless one
To take the thrashing in his place,
And suffer all the hot disgrace
He merited. And now I wonder
How those who sat such preaching under
Could possibly learn to be just,
While such false thoughts were on them thrust.

If God were guilty the disgrace
Of doing wrong to save the race,
I'm sure all honest men would pray
To find some less repulsiv way
Of paying debts they had contracted,
And settling wrongs they had enacted!

But now I can no longer fret,
I know each soul pays its own debt!

Then take care, you who rob the poor,
The bill will come to your own door!
No Christ's blood saves you from the hell
Which conscience kindles, when the mel-
Lowing light of wisdom falls
Upon your thefts—your "puts and calls."

O. F. T.

The Honest Clergyman.

The other day some jolly young fellows in Bloomington got hold of an old pocketbook, and stuffed it full of paper, and managed to lose it in front of a large clothing store. Then they went inside to see what people would do. Four or five persons walked over it without noticing it, and then a prominent citizen, formerly engaged in the newspaper business, came along and stepped on the pocket-book, and stood their innocently stroking his beard and waiting a chance to pick it up without being observed. At last the supposed opportunity arrived, and he stooped down and was just picking it up, when one of the jolly fellows called out:

"O boys! I've lost my pocket-book," and ran to the door near where the retired business man was picking up the book. He put his foot on it again, and would hav stood there till dark, if the young man had not remarked:

"Excuse me, sir, but you are standing on my pocket-book."

"Oh, I guess not," said the man drawing his foot along a little, but keeping the book under it.

"Yes, you are. I saw you put your foot on it."

"How much is there in it?"

"Ninety dollars."

"Well, I wish I could find it and claim the reward."

"Don't you know it is under your foot?"

"No."

"Well it is," and the jolly young fellow pushed him away and picked up the wallet.

"It is customary to pay ten per cent reward on money found and returned to its owner," said the man.

"Yes, but you said you did not know it was under your foot, and I found it myself;" and the retired business man went off, kicking himself every third step, and wishing he had picked it up when he first saw it; and when he got home, he told his wife she would hav to wash without soap that week, because he had lost ninety dollars.

The boys took turns walking up and down before the store and losing the pocket-book, and nearly everybody would pick it up and return it to the fellow that lost it, and mentally swear when he saw no disposition to pay a reward that if he ever found another pocket-book he would keep it, and finally one of them lost it by the side of a preacher, and a lady walking behind picked it up and told the preacher she had seen him drop his pocket-book, and he took it and thanked her, and put it in his pocket, and took out his purse and paid her a reward of two dollars, and then, after telling her how much better it is to be honest, and that honesty is the best policy, and so on, he hurried away toward his home The next Sunday he preached a long sermon on delusions and snares, and such things, and asserted that a man who would giv another a pocket-book with nothing in it, was no better than he should be, and that a woman who would cut that kind of a caper is as bad as a thief.—Through Mail.

Stray Scraps.

Accept my thanks for TRUTH SEEKER, Nov. 15th, editorial, "Unwarrantable Condemnation of Phallic Worship." Such subscribers need educating. Will you not publish Charles F. Blackburn's article on Mormonism, on page 1st, Boston Investigator, Nov. 13th?

"Aunty: 'Don't you say your prayers in the morning, too, Johnny?' Johnny, scornfully: 'Of course I don't. Anybody can take care of himself in the daytime.'" That's so, Johnny, and so anybody can take care of himself in the night, for all any God taking care of him for the asking.

"A New Haven druggist says he has many calls for cigarets from actresses and also from young ladies of good families. Some married ladies smoke with their husband's consent." Indeed! I know some married gentlemen who smoke without their wive's consent, yea, who smoke against their wive's comfort and taste. Happy wives they who smoke with their husband's consent, without which they would not smoke at all.

The St. James Gazette says life was never so unsafe in London as at the present time. Remember, London is the great religious emporium of "Christian England." This proves the more Christianity the more crime. And yet our Christian opponents boast that Christianity is an antidote for all crime, and tha only Infidels and Agnostics are vicious. Well brag away church fanatics, prison statistics and figures elsewhere won't lie.

Said Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, in his famous speech before the Norfolk Club, Boston, Nov. 22d: "The American Missionary Society in which there is scarcely a Democrat contributes more in a year to build up and benefit the people in the Southern states than all the Democrats in the country." In view of the fact that "Christian England," after many centuries of Christian rule, was never so unsafe in its metropolis as now, givs us sinners and heretics the right to doubt whether this Missionary Society does "benefit the Southern people" by planting this same Christian religion there that has so signally failed in making life safe in this noted "Christian kingdom on whose dominions the sun never sets."

Professor Yelland, in his advice to young men on reading, closes with, "Disdain the writings of the modern skeptic and Infidel. Spend your time on such books as will, not only interest the mind, but improve the intellect and cultivate the moral faculties. Read the 'Book of Proverbs,' and the scriptures generally. B ecome useful members of society, respected in life and die with the serene peace of a Christian." Now, that is fine! Why did not the professor specify along side of proverbs that other chaste book to "cultivate the moral faculties," "The Songs of Solomon?" All through his advice the professor attributes to fiction and infamous books the crimes of the present day, especially the irreligion of youth, to reading irreligious books. Now, that is encouragtng to us Liberals, to circulate far and wide among the children and young men and women our literature. Set them to thinking, and it will be very difficult, in this enlightened age, for them even to catch the babies in their Sunday-school gospel-net, however heavily laden with Christmas Santa Claus presents, and other bait on other great occasions. The learned professors and divines are very shrewd, but they must not let the cat out of the bag by telling tales out of school.

"At the regular weekly meeting of the Boston preachers, Monday, A.M , Oct. 20th, in the Vestry Tremont Temple, the discussion was the following: Resolved, That the irreligious spirit and the non-church going habits of our American people are a greater source of danger to religious progress in this country than the evil of the foreign population and Roman Catholicism." Roman Catholicism! "The dangers of Romanism" has been the cry of the Protestent clergy up to the very hour when the Rev. Dr. Burchard associated Romanism with Rum and Rebellion as the elements of the Democratic party in his speech of welcome to Mr. Blaine at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, Oct. 29, 1884. And the poor wretch (the reverend doctor) was forced to write an apologetical letter to the Republican National Headquarters, and confess he did not mean just what he did mean. And wherefore? Why, of the offense to the Catholic voter! But it seems the apology did not heal the wound, for it is generally conceded by the leaders of the party that the "ill-timed alliteration lost Blaine 10,000 votes." So much for Uzzah putting forth his hand to save the ark when it jostled (see 2 Samuel vi, 6-12).

In this Weekly, which is now in the 13th year of its existence, political, social, and religious matters are discussed with a view to general enlightenment and progress. The "Turnzeitung," issued as a supplement to the "Freidenker," is especially devoted to the discussion of topics pertaining to physical culture, and matters of interest to lovers of the gymnastical art.

From January 1, 1885, the "Freidenker" will be enlarged, thus furnishing CONSIDERABLY MORE READING MATTER, while the PRICE WILL REMAIN THE SAME AS BEFORE.

For the convenience of those of our readers who are chiefly interested in matters relating to gymnastics, the "Freidenker" and "Turnzeitung" will be consolidated into one paper, to be called "Amerikanische Turnzeitung," with the sub-heading "Turnerische Ausgabe des 'Freidenker.'"

This paper will contain more reading matter than furnished by both the "Freidenker" and the "Turnzeitung" heretofore. In making these changes, the publishers have incurred great expense, and we therefore solicit the hearty co-operation of all friends of the cause in securing for the "Freidenker" and the "Amerikanische Turnzeitung" a wider circulation.

We also publish:

"Erziehungsblatter"

1857. SECOND GRAND ANNUAL 1885.

New Years Gift Presentation,

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE 28TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE

ROCHELLE JEWELRY STORE.

January* 1, 1885,

At* 2 P. M., *ROCHELLE, ILL.

Last year on New Year's day Wettstein presented to his patrons assembled in Armory Hall, a valuable collection of beautiful presents, comprising 10 Gold Watches and Gold Chains; half a dozen genuin Diamond Pins, Rings, and Eardrops; over a dozen fine Silver Watches, solid Gold Jewelry, elegant Silverware, Fancy Goods, etc., ranging in price from $1.00 to $100.00.

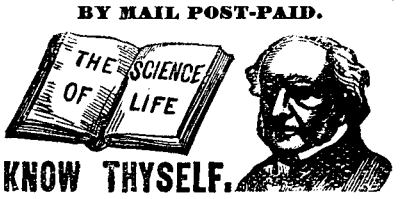
This I propose to do this year and to giv my Liberal friends abroad an opportunity to receive a nice present.

The aggregate of goods presented will not be less than $1,500, and probably $2,000, according to amount of goods sold.

To all my customers sending $1.00 or more for goods or work I shall present, for each and every dollar, a certificate entitling the owner to one or more shares in these gifts.

This is the fairest and most liberal offer ever made by any merchant in America My stock is complete in everything pertaining to a first-class jewelry store; prices now averaging 25 per cent below those of largest cities; goods sent by mail or express to all parts of the world accompanied by one certificate for every dollar remitted, and cash refunded if not satisfactory, and returned same day received.

Prices on watches again reduced since last price list in this paper. The presents will be presented in a public hall of Rochelle, directly to my customers, or to a committee selected by them at that time, in one entire lot, and the mode of distribution will be optional with them.



Everybody pleased last year, and all must be pleased this year.

Circulars giving all particulars and describing style and value of each gift, mailed free on application. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Something for Invalids to read and study over—Stop Drugging and try Nature's Remedy, MAGNETISM.

For years past it has been known to the profession that Magnetism and Electricity were powerful agents for imparting vital force and energy to the worn-out sufferer from disease. Many humanitarians in the profession, thinking more of the alleviation of suffering than they did of the code of ethics by which they were bound, have resorted to magnetic treatment as a last resort and found themselves astonished at the effect upon their patients. They had been taught that medicine was an absolute essential in all cases, and that that failing, the patient must die, as nothing more could be done. Here and there an advanced thinker has flung aside the tie which bound him to his dogmatic brethren and has resorted to other and more scientific methods of treatment. As a result many, having broken the bonds which bound them to a system as barbarous as it was unscientific, have used their best energies to devise means for the alleviation of human suffering Here and there the wondrous power of MAGNETISM was established, and many diseases hitherto classed as incurable readily submitted to its mild but potent influence. This agent to the intelligent observer was found everywhere. Being, as it is, the very essential of all life, it was found that the human body when in a diseased condition was almost bereft of this vital principle. If we can supply this vital force to the worn-out body the patient will get well.

And but how is it to be done, says the physician. Science, however, came to the rescue, and solved the problem. Here and there throughout the world are fields of what are known as magnetic ore. It was observed that the ore, when carried upon the person, was found to be a safeguard against disease, and to this circumstance we are largely indebted for magnetic wearing apparel, for it was an easy transition from carrying magnetic ore to covering the body with permanently charged magnets, placed in garments fitted to every part of the body Since the first introduction of magnetic appliances as a curative, there has been a number of these so-called magnetic garments foisted upon the public by men whose sole object was gain. Unscientific in construction, and having little if any magnetism in them, their life was of short duration; it was long enough, however, to demonstrate that when constructed upon scientific principles there was scarcely an ailment that human flesh is heir to that would not submit to their healing influence.

THE EUREKA MAGNETIC APPLIANCES are superior to everything of a similar character heretofore offered to the public, being the only scientifically constructed appliance in the market; it is now two and a half years since they were first offered to the public, and during that time we have treated thousands of patients, and not a single case of failure to receive benefit reported to us, while we are in daily receipt of testimonials of cures from all parts of the country. We know that disease cannot exist where these garments are worn in quantities as advised by us.

To all who may be afflicted with any of the following complaints, we say unhesitatingly, the Eureka Magnetic Garments will cure you:—Paralysis, Rheumatism, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Bleeding at the Lungs, Spinal Disease, Gout, Asthma, Bronchitis, Congestion of the Kidneys, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Loss of Energy, Heart Disease, Constipation, Consumption, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Peritonitis, Cancer, Ovarian Tumors, Syphilis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus' Dance, and all forms of chronic invalidism.

Odds and Ends.

"YOU want to aim very low when you are hunting the bison," said an old hunter. "How low?" asked a tenderfoot. "Buffalo," replied the hunter, without a struggle.

"YES," said Clara's dear friend, when Clara, the theatrical star, showed her photograph; "yes, Clara, I think it's a lovely picture. By the way, who did you get to sit for you?"

A GENTLEMAN who was dining with a young married couple in Kansas asked rather abruptly: "Ever had a cyclone here?" The young couple looked guiltily at each other, blushed, and changed the subject.

PEDESTRIAN (who has lost his way): "Why don't you hav guide-boards round here, so that a stranger can tell where he is going? Now, in the city we hav plenty of guide-boards—one on every corner." Farmer: "Why didn't you bring a few along with you, then?"

I HELD her tiny hand in mine, and clasped her fairy form, and told my tale of ardent love, in language sweet and warm. And when I paused for want of breath, she raised her dimpled chin, and whispered low, "I don't catch on, please sing your song agin."

A CLERGYMAN "had a call" the other day to a new parish. To his church officers he said, "Brethren, this seems a providential call, and I must follow the leadings of Providence and go where I can do the most good." And then he added, "The salary is a good deal larger, and I must look out for my family."

"UNCLE JOSH," I said, "don't you believe in the efficacy of special prayer?" "What do you mean by special prayer?" asked Uncle Josh, picking a turkey feather off his trousers. "By special prayer I mean where you pray for an especial thing." "Wa'al, now, Mister Perkins, dat depends. It depends a good deal on what yo' pray for." "How is that, Uncle Josh?" "Wa'al, I allays notice dat when I pray de Lord to send one o' Massa Shelby's turkeys to de ole man it don't come, but when I prays dat he'll send de ole man after de turkey, my prayer is allays answered."

COL. YERGER, meeting the Rev. Whangdoodle Baxter on Austin avenue, asked him, "How is your congregation coming on?" "We am goin' right ahead, sah. Since we has quit passin' de hat we has taken in lots ob money. De kerleckshuns has increased wonderfully, sah, wonderfully." "I don't understand how you can take up collections if you don't pass the hat." "We pass de plate now." "Well, that's the same as passing the hat, isn't it?" "No, sah, hit ain't de same thing. Deacon Webster passed de hat for moah dan a year, and de kerleckshuns was mighty small; but now I passes de plate myse'f, an' de money just rolls in. De plate am much more reliable dan de hat." "How is that?" "Deacon Webster put tar in de top ob his hat."

IN the wee sma' and dark hours of Saturday morning Mr. Blank's front door bell rang vigorously. The worthy citizen went at once to the door, where he found his man Michael in a troubled state of mind. [illegible] with an addition to his family; that the doctor called in attendance had demanded immediate payment for his services. Having no money in the house, he had called upon Mr. Blank to borrow some. Michael immediately received what he wanted, and with profuse apologies for calling at such an unseasonable hour, departed. The next morning Mr. Blank's daughters, who had heard the bell ring, asked who it was that called so late, and they were informed of the circumstances. "Poor little thing!" sympathetically exclaimed a bright little miss of twelve summers; "came C. O. D, didn't it?"

A GOOD old Methodist lady, very particular and very pious, once kept a boarding-house in New York. Stanch to her principles, she would take no one to board who did not hold to the eternal punishment of a large portion of the race. But the people were more intent on carnal comforts than spiritual health, so that in time her house became empty, much to her grief and alarm. After some time a bluff old sea captain knocked at the door, and the old lady answered the call. 'Good morning, ma'am. Can you giv me board for two or three days? Got my ship here, and shall be off soon as I load." "Wa'al, I don't know," said the old lady. "Oh, house full, eh?" "No, but—" "But what, ma'am?" "I don't take any unclean or carnal people in my house. What do you believe?" "About what?" "Why, do you believe that anyone will be condemned?" Oh, thunder! yes." "Do you?" said the good woman, brightening up "Well, how many souls do you think will be on fire eternally?" "Don't know, ma'am, really—never calculated that." "Can't you guess?" "Can't say—perhaps fifty thousand." "Wa'al, hem!" mused the old woman; "I guess I'll take you; fifty thousand burning souls is better than nothing."

MISS TOOTSEY MITE (variety actress): "O professor, I am so glad I met you. I've just got an engagement, and I want you to compose me a first-class, A 1 song and dance—something real jiggy and jolly, you know." Musical composer: "With pleasure, my dear young lady. You want something that will set all the gallery boys to beating time with their feet, and make the parquet feel like jumping up and joining in the breakdown. Something in sailor's hornpipe time, I suppose?" Miss Tootsey Mite: "Just the thing. I hav the words ready; all I want is the music; must be a full orchestra accompaniment, you know, and must be done by six o'clock, so that there will be time to rehearse it." Musical composer: "Goodness gracious! I can't get up anything in that time; it is impossible. The idea! Why, it's four o'clock now." Miss Tootsey Mite: "But I must hav it. It is my first appearance at the new Vaudeville. Havn't you something already written that will do?" Musical composer: "So I hav. Never thought of it. Here is a piece just finished. All it wants is the words." Miss Tootsey Mite: "Oh, that will do splendidly. So bright and dashing! Did you compose this for a song and dance?" Musical composer: "Well, no. It was for a Cincinnati sacred concert."
